Cook With Wine

Hopkins prefers sauces to the use of wine in the actual cooking of food, excepting soups and stews, in which he says wine does something for the flavor that no other seasoning can duplicate.

According to Mr. Hopkins, a simple kind of sauce and one that is particularly good with fish is a white wine sauce that is made like this:

Brown three tablespoons of butter with one tablespoon of flour. Beat in one cup of hot cream and one-fourth cup of white wine, stirring vigorously. Boil for five minutes and serve hot.

Making a Madeira Sauce

To make a tossed salad taste even better, or to give a fillip to red meats, Mr. Hopkins suggests a Madeira sauce. Here's how to make it:

Beat yolks of six eggs and mix with three tablespoons of sugar, juice and grated rind of one lemon and three-fourths cup of Madeira. Place in top of double boiler over boiling water and beat continuously until mixture becomes thick yellow froth. Serve cold.

Mr. Hopkins offers the following version of Hollandaise sauce:

Ingredients: Six egg yolks, three fourths pound of butter, one-fourth cup of white wine, salt and pepper to taste.

Have butter melted but not hot. Mix with egg yolks. Add wine and seasoning a little at a time, beating constantly. Do not heat the sauce as it will curdle.

According to Mrs. Hopkins, it can be stored in the refrigerator indefinitely and serves as a handy thinner for other sauces.

FIND LONDON CRAMPED AFTER HUGE DIOCESE

LONDON, April 12 —(CP) — Home on vacation for the first time in 15 years, Rev. Harry Griffiths and his wife find London a little "cramped" after the vast open spaces of Australia's northern territory.

Grey-haired and wiry, Mr. Griffiths is bishop of the diocese with a radius of almost 1,000 miles of Australia's toughest country.

As director of the Methodist Inland Mission, he supervises the work of 12 Methodist ministers who cover the white population of the diocese.

They fly their own aircraft, drive trucks and must be highly trained in first aid, dentistry and bushcraft.

Mr. and Mrs. Griffiths went to Australia 20 years ago, starting their work in a parish roughly as big as half Europe and covering many of their patrols on horseback.

Island Odds And Ends

Used cars are worth far less today than they were a year or two ago. Manufacturers have been catching up with the back-log which was built up during the war, and anybody with the money can obtain a new model with very little delay. Trade-ins are more plentiful and therefore, worth less money.

About two years ago, second-hand cars two or three years old, were being sold almost at their original value despite the fact that they might have been driven fifteen to twenty thousand miles. Today a car one year old depreciates in value much as it did before the war.

There are two types of old cars, those of recent make and models built before and immediately after the war started. There was a gap between 1941 and 1945 or thereabouts, when only a trickle of cars was manufactured, for private use.

Practically every car dealer in the province has second-hand cars for sale, half at least of them of recent make. Dealers are not inclined to take trade-ins if the prospective buyer is asking a high price for his old car. With the used car lots filling up, dealers cannot afford to be too generous in their trade-in terms. Thus for the first time in some years the man of limited means has an opportunity of obtaining a useful car at a fairly reasonable price. Values, however, have not yet tumbled to pre-war levels, and many cars which would have been considered ready for the junk pile before 1939, are now being sold for two or three hundred dollars. Perhaps this is the last year that the old timers will be of much value. Next year production not only may have caught up with demand, but may surpass it so far, that car prices may take a drop.

Competition among manufacturers might then give the general public a long awaited break.

Twenty thousand Dutch farmers will be brought to Canada this year but under different arrangements than previously. Hitherto the Hollanders dribbled into the country only as they were asked for by individual farmers requesting farm help. With the approval of the Netherland Government, which saw to it that wages and living conditions were adequate, many solid and well-qualified Dutch farmers were settled in all parts of Canada. However it was found that the system was slow and exasperating and ways and means of speeding it up are said to have been worked out. Under the new dispensation the Dutch emigrants will come to Canada in large groups and farm work will be found for them after they reach this country. Until this year applications for farm help went forward to the Dutch Government as they were received and it has usually been three or four months between application and the arrival of the newcomers.

The Dutch have made a great impression in Prince Edward Island for their knowledge of farming, their willingness to work, the ease with which they master English and their familiarity with our parliamentary system of government.

Unlike the unfortunate Displaced Persons who lost everything they possessed, in the war,

In the World of Books

With Will R. Bird

This past week the press has featured the news that the best British writers are doing no more than part time writing. This for the reason that an incredibly stupid income tax ruling takes away their earnings and leaves them with little more than the wages of a ditch digger. The loss to Britain of a literature that might have been cannot be reckoned in pounds and pence.

Gentle Greaves by Ernest Raymond; British Book Service (Canada) Ltd; $3.00

Those who have read Mr. Raymond's unforgettable "We, the Accused," and "The Jesting Army," will know, without being told, that a book by such a writer is bound to be good. The New York Times has said that his books could be used in class rooms as examples of perfect novels, and many readers will agree one hundred per cent. This latest book, "Gentle Greaves," is, in many respects, the greatest Mr. Raymond has written. Here is the master craftsman at his brilliant best, expressing a love of England and English life with touches of gentle irony, telling of the qualities that have made the people of that tight little island leaders in civilization, yet never omitting to keep his story moving at exactly the right pace.

It is an extremely clever book. The reader is introduced to the atmosphere of post-war London, and then the contrast with fifty years ago is adroitly presented Soon the full flavor of the house at the corner of Coburg Square is passed along and the family introductions are a matter of course. It is a family of exactly the right size. One more would have become tedious; one less would not have been sufficient. In old Lettice is a representation of the grand old regime of family servants. Uncle Humphrey is a character that belongs to the picture by every right of fiction, and the old colonel himself is simply priceless.

The story opens with a silver-haired gentleman and his neice returning to a bombed part of London to live in an old and rather battered house that belonged to the gentleman's boyhood. He lets his memory revive for him the thoughts of his childhood, and is so moved that he goes to the third story and there writes his life story. Becoming ill, he asks his niece to take the manuscript and read every word before she visits his room again. She reads a day and a night, and the reader is privileged to look over her shoulder and scan what the old gentleman has penned.

I doubt that there will be any reader who takes up this book and after reading the first chapters, puts it down to wait until another time. One goes with the children to play on the grass at the parks, to public school with young Doris, to parties and parades, entertained all the while by the antics of the old colonel and the emotions of Doric's sentimental aunt, Gentle's mother. Gentle herself tugs at the reader's heart time and again, until no matter what she does, he will defend her. The character studies are the work of a master, This is a really great English novel.

Winning Dive by Mary Graham Bonner; McClelland & Stewart; $2.50

This is a grand book for teenage girls and boys, a camp story crammed with a love of sport and exciting adventure. Miss Bonner was only two months old when she arrived at Halifax. She was educated at the Halifax Ladies College, and studied at the Halifax Conservatory of Music. She was centre on the school basketball team, goalie for the hockey team and went in for riding, high jumping, swimming and camping. She had a book allowance and was a book buyer from the age of nine. She writes; "I aim at an exciting story incorporating the spirit of fair play which I believe that young people understand far better than their elders. I think the young person today is more self-reliant than ever, a good sport, and would be free of evil prejudices if other people avoided injecting thoughtless remarks about other religions or races than his own." This is a fine juvenille book.

The Silent Gulls by George E. Tait; Ryerson Press; $2.00.

When a boy is eleven summer vacation can be a wonderful experience, and this author has really put his heart in this book. No person who did not love boys and their ambitions could have written it. It is about a vacation spent on the shore of Lake Huron, where the hero is accused, wrongly, of shooting gulls. The author has illustrated the story and the drawings are excellent, as is the map inside the cover. The real atmosphere of the wilds is in this story, and the whole is an outstanding contribution to the juvenile field

Adventures With The Giants by Catharine F. Sellew; McClelland & Stewart; $3.00.

Fourteen stories of the Norsemen are in this book which is designed for young readers. The chapter titles tell pretty much the exciting contents, and the stories are based on the legends of the Norsemen.

Court Circular by Sewell Stokes; Collins; 264 pages; $2.50.

This is a most unusual book, and vastly entertaining. The author states that he spent four years as a Probation Officer at one of London's most famous courts, and was simply compelled to write about his experiences. The book is not a collection of anecdotes jotted down at random. Far from it. It is a personal narrative in which the characters are as fully developed as they would be in a novel; their day to day adventures can be followed with increasing interest from the first chapter to the last. "Each year," writes Mr. Stokes, "I found more stimulating, astonishing, wildly amusing and heartbreaking than the last. At times I could have cried with pity, boiled over with imagination; but the days were few on which I did not also burst with laughter."

One of his first efforts was to interview the father of a sailor lad who was in prison for fighting with police officers when drunk. He wrote and asked the parent if he might call on behalf of the boy. The answer was a half-sheet with "Come if you want to. E. Braxton" written on it. Stokes located the address, rang the bell and had no answer. He stepped over to peer in the window and unwittingly trod on some pansies, was made aware of the fact by a small boy who appeared and informed the caller that E. Braxton was in the backyard. Mr. Stokes found Mr. Braxton repairing a bicycle tire and most unresponsive. He was doing his utmost with the difficult man when he noticed Mr. Braxton's trousers. They were undeniably part of a policeman's uniform. Not only was Braxton a "copper," he was the one his own son had attacked. As Mr. Stokes tried to make a diplomatic exit the young lad appeared and "poured a pail of water on my shoes, saying it was punishment for treading on his pansies. All in all, it was a most difficult morning."

The beggars and the prostitutes were the most troublesome for the Probation Officer, and Mr. Stokes relates some astounding details. His experience, too, with the drunken wife of a Lord makes interesting reading. If you are a wee bit tired of detective stories or romance, bored with all types of fiction, get this book and snuggle down for an evening by yourself. You'll be finely entertained.

Bones Of Contention by Rae Foley Dodd Mead & Co Ltd; $3.00.

This is a Red Badge Mystery Story, which means it is better than the average of this type. I like a book that gets down to business without a long round of introductions, and here is one that has you on your toes after the first sentence. It gets right into mystery and action, and the pleasing thing about it is that there is no letdown afterward. The entire story is a thriller. If you think that an attractive young woman with a generous amount of intelligence cannot become engaged to a stranger with in an hour after meeting him, read Rae Foley's account of such a happening, and you'll be convinced.

There is the usual dead body, and the heroine stumbles over it in the most unexpected place. There was the killer who spread terror about the quiet countryside, and mysterious Bootleggers' House is built up in the approved mystery fashion. Mr. Foley is an experienced writer, and he has written a very clever story, one that holds the reader in suspense to the final paragrapsh. What more can be asked of a mystery novel?
