CHAPTER THREE

Part Two

Oakhart sprawled, a low English Tudor house of weathered old brick, leaded windows gleaming in the afternoon sunlight, a blue-gray slate roof blending into the hazy spring sky.

Mr. Prentice met them in the dark, polished hall. Through glass doors leading to the living room Janet saw that all the furniture was covered with mistletoe dust protectors. At the sight of Cliff, the lawyer raised his eyebrows slightly.

"Mr. Prentice, may I present Dr. Bronson? He was one of the witnesses of Mr. Hartigan's will," Janet explained.

"Delighted, Mr. Bronson, but it really wasn't necessary for you to come."

"He very kindly offered to drive me to Oakhart," Janet said. "It doesn't matter if he hears the reading too, does it?"

"No, of course not, not at all!" Mr. Prentice tried hard to sound affable, but he was not convincing. "As the house hasn't been in use for a year, I phoned ahead and had Mrs. Miles open the den. There's more warmth in there."

He ushered them through a paneled cherry-wood door of Gothic design. Six people were seated around the long, polished refectory table inside; small briquet fire flickered in the grate.

Mr. Prentice gestured first at the two women and man, sitting close together near the door. Janet recognized them as the three she had seen at the chapel service. They all seemed cut from the same mold—long, thin, supercilious faces with small, nervous dark eyes and tension written in every line of their angular bodies.

"Mr. Hartigan's grandniece, Mrs. Augustine Gremont; her husband, Mr. Gremont, and their daughter, Miss Gwendolyn Gremont."

His eyes shifted to a moon-faced smiling woman of about forty-five who was dressed in a rather too-tight suit of mannish tweeds and a battered felt hat with a drooping feather.

"His other grandniece, Miss Abigail Hartigan, and of course you already know Mr. and Mrs. Miles, Miss Harris."

He gestured toward the obviously embarrassed caretaker and his wife as though they were the only two he would expect Janet to be on familiar terms with. She was grateful for Cliff's steady hand beneath her elbow.

Motioning to two vacant chairs, the lawyer seated himself at the head of the table. With great deliberation he removed some papers from his briefcase. Janet recognized Mr. Hartigan's spidery writing.

"This is the original will," Mr. Prentice explained. "It was my intention to put it in legal form, but Mr. Hartigan's unexpectedly sudden death prevented it and this bears the original signatures."

He paused for a moment, and seemed to take on the opalescent glaze of a dying cod.

"Mr. Hartigan's will," he said precisely, "is going to come as a shock to some of you, I'm afraid."

For a mere instant Mrs. Gremont appeared startled, then she quickly regained her smug mask. She moved closer to the table, sitting more erectly. Without turning her head, her eyes swept over her sister, Abigail—pity and condescension were reflected in them...

Mr. Prentice adjusted his pince-nez. His thin lips began to move, his voice rising and falling monotonously, without inflection, as though he were delivering a boring sermon for the one-hundredth time.

"I, Sean Bryan Hartigan, being of sound mind, do hereby declare this to be my last will and testament, taking precedence over any former wills..."

His voice droned on, reading the legal tones that clever old Mr. Hartigan knew from experience were necessary. Janet saw the three Gremonts leaning forward tensely. Mrs. Gremont's long, scarlet-lacquered nails were like talons grasping the table edge, her eyes glittered with avarice.

"To my grand niece, Irene Hartigan Gremont, her husband, Justice Gremont, and their daughter, Gwendolyn, I leave the sum of one dollar each. They are amply supplied with the world's goods and have no need of my money."

There was a loud, sucking intake of breath as Mrs. Gremont stood up. "There's been some mistake! We are Mr. Hartigan's nearest relatives—he can't have been in his right mind!"

Her brittle, cigarette-husky voice cracked gratefully. Mr. Prentice held up an admonishing hand...

"Please, Mrs. Gremont, let me finish the will before you discuss it."

She sat down and he continued, "To my other grandniece, Abigail

Office Workers At Ford Plant Strike

WINDSOR, Ont., May 19 — (CP)—Ford of Canada office workers went on strike late Sunday to back contract demands pending since last Aug. 1. Union officials said the walkout will immobilize the Ford plant "within a couple of days."

The move followed a membership meeting today of Local 240, the United Automobile Workers (C.I.O.-C.C.L.) which represents the 900 workers of the Ford bargaining unit.

Union officials said the 500 who attended the meeting cheered George Burt, U. A. W. Canadian director, when he told them of the strike decision. A membership meeting May 6 gave the union executive the power to call a legal strike.
