

Test Of Authority Looms For Sharp Over Bank Act

By JAMES NELSON
OTTAWA (CP) — On a significant revision of the Bank Act is off again, this time in circumstances which point to a real test of authority facing Finance Minister Sharp.

The revision of the basic law governing Canada's chartered banks was to have been introduced today, according to a government announcement Wednesday.

But Thursday a decision was made to postpone it again. The chartered banks have been running more than two years on periodic extensions to the 1954 law which was due for revision in 1964.

No official explanation was given for the further delay. A finance department source said that while no new date has been set, it is hoped the bill will be introduced later next week, or at least before Parliament adjourns for a summer recess early in July.

Tough Passage Is Foreseen For Canada Assistance Plan

By DENNIS BELL
VANCOUVER (CP) — The $35,000,000 Canada Assistance Plan "will never get off the ground" if it takes on responsibility for minimum fixed incomes for the elderly, a special consultant to the Senate committee on aging said here.

Dr. R. E. G. Davis, the man behind many of the 92 recommendations in the Senate report, made the comment in an interview.

He was here to address the Canadian Conference on Social Welfare.

Dr. Davis said the government should draft separate legislation setting minimum fixed incomes for the elderly at $1,260 per single person and $2,220 per couple. The fixed income rates were recommended in the Senate report, tabled in the Commons in February.

"If we don't pass a separate measure such as this, I think the Canada Assistance Plan will be ground," he said.

He estimated that it would cost approximately $250,000,000 in benefits paid under the assistance plan, or under separate legislation.

But if fixed incomes come under the assistance plan, administrative costs will skyrocket, Dr. Davis said.

MacEachen should stop regarding the Canada Assistance Plan as "the two pillars of our society because they're not."

The welfare specialist said boosting old age pensions from $75 to $100 a month is not the answer. He estimated such action would cost close to $1,000,000,000.

"I think the opposition parties in the Commons—even the New Democrats—would be willing to settle for special measures guaranteeing economic security for the aged," he said.

Dr. Davis said if Canadian society wants to meet the challenge presented to it by the problems of aging, it must be prepared to think in "large dimensions" rather than in terms of modest goals and little projects.

He said economic security has top priority in the list of measures the elderly need.

Health security, he said, is a close second.

"What I am talking about essentially is the conservation and enrichment of our human resources," he said.

"The seriousness with which we view our national obligation in this regard may well serve to measure the level of our culture."

Wednesday Works Minister McElraith, government House leader, said the bill would be brought on for preliminary debate Monday.

Sometime Thursday the decision was made to postpone the measure to an indefinite date.

A showdown appeared to be shaping up for next week when Prime Minister Pearson returns from a weekend trip to Toronto and his Northern Ontario home riding of Algoma East.

Trade Minister Winters, in Ottawa last week to sign a new trade pact and wheat sale agreement with Russia, also returns this weekend.

He is believed to side with Mr. Sharp though the two men are rivals for political leadership.

Other sources indicate that a fundamental division of opinion has been opened again between Mr. Sharp and his supporters and a dissent group outside the Cabinet which includes Walter Gordon, former finance minister, and Maurice Lamontagne, former state secretary.

Mr. Sharp has been reported willing to accept at least in part, the recommendation of the 1964 Porte Royal commission on banking and finance that the present ceiling of six per cent be lifted off the interest rate the banks may charge on loans.

The banks have argued that the interest ceiling prevents from competing effectively with trust and loan companies. Lifting the ceiling would enable banks to pay more in interest to depositors and let them par-

LONDON (AP)—Sir Winston Churchill took pride in holding a card in the bricklayers' union, but he had doubts about his skill.

This came to light here with disclosure of an exchange of letters in 1928 between Churchill and the union, which invited him to join after learning that he had built a brick wall at his chertwell home.

"I do not feel that I am sufficiently qualified," Churchill wrote the late J. F. Lane, secretary of the Amalgamated Union of Building Trade Workers.

Lane replied: "I was aware that you would not be sufficiently competent to carry on the work of a fully qualified bricklayer but at the same time I think that as time passes, you will improve your craft."

Churchill, who at the time was chancellor of the exchequer, was curious about the union rules and asked in a light vein:

"Would you mind, however, letting me know whether, for instance, there is a rule regulating the number of bricks a man may lay in a day? ... and what are the restrictions on overtime?"

He was assured that his was a special case.

The letters will be auctioned at Sotheby's July 13. They are being put up for sale by Lane's son.
