Agricultural

(Continued from page 5) ment, if any, will depend on the extent that the national average market price of grade A hogs falls below the national support level.

Although domestic disappearance of pork has increased substantially during 1959, it has not kept pace with output. Disappearance is expected to be equivalent to almost seven million hogs, about 1.3 million less than the probable marketings during the year. Exports are expected to account for about one-half million hogs, leaving a surplus of approximately one and one-quarter million hogs for the calendar year, largely accounted for by purchases of the Agricultural Stablization Board.

During 1959 the Board purchased and stored pork as primal cuts and canned pork.

With prospective marketings in 1960 estimated at 7.0 to 7.5 million hogs and the probability of an increase in domestic disappearance during the year it is likely that marketings will be disposed of with little carryover. However, since a larger than usual proportion of the annual marketings is likely to occur in the first half of the year, a surplus over domestic requirements is expected during this period.

An inexpensive way of returning nitrogen to the soil is by planting an inoculated legume crop and later turning it under. Inoculated legume seed products nodules which contain a special type of bacteria that are able to take nitrogen from the air and convert it into a soluble form for the legume plant's use. Since organic matter holds most of the reserve supply of nitrogen it follows that when the legume plant decays, nitrogen is again released into the soil for use by cereal or grass crops.

Nitrogen supply in soils may also be increased by the use of a commercial fertilizers but an acre's supply of 50 lb. would cost $6.00 plus application costs. Inoculating legume seed costs as little as 20 cents a pound and produces 50 or more pounds of nitrogen an acre. Untreated legume seed depletes the soil's nitrogen supply as it takes it from the soil just as any other plant.

KNOWLEDGE HELPS

Terylene sewing thread, as yet little known, should not be confused with the old nylon thread which formerly presented sewing difficulties, such as puckered seams. The new thread proves very satisfactory for sewing nylon, orlon and terylene materials. Although it comes in a limited number of colors its translucent quality allows the color of the fabric to show through and so forms a good match.

There are a few things about this synthetic however, which if they are known will prevent minor sewing irritations. Because terylene is slippery it will not hold knots, so instead of tying thread ends keep seams from opening by finishing with a ½-inch of reverse stitching.

If seem ripping is necessary cut stitches in several places and pull the thread out in short pieces. Trying to yank out long pieces can result in cut material. Use a fine, sharp sewing machine needle with Terylene thread (No 11 Singer) or its equivalent. Then test the machine tension on a sample and adjust if necessary.

Don't break all speed limits when sewing with this thread. Best results will follow a uniform, slow pace. Complete your sewing operations by ironing at the temperature designated for synthetics so that thread melting won't take place.
