SCHOOL-ROOM COURTESY. Among the editorial items on the first page of The School Journal for March 2 are a few lines concerning the department of a teacher in the classroom. The article closing with the words, "There is such a thing as schoolroom etiquette. The teacher is critically observed. If his doings and sayings are condemned he cannot expect the influence that forms character." Once upon a time a certain mother noted a remarkable change in the deportment of her six-year-old son, who from a rough, noisy, discourteous boy, became transformed into one of the gentlest, most courteous and considerate little fellows in the world. The child was attending a kindergarten, and the mother naturally inferred that to his teacher was due the change she was glad to notice him. "What a splendid change you be polite," she remarked, making what was really an assertion in an interrogative tone. "No, she never teaches us one bit about it," was the instant and very emphatic reply. The mother was puzzled, for she was at a loss to account in any other way for so radical a change. A second and third attempt to discover the cause of this conduct was attended with a similar result,—energetic denial on the part of the child of any instruction in the matter of courtesy. Well, then, if Miss Smith doesn't say anything about it, she do?" she asked at length, quite desperate in her desire for light upon the matter. "She doesn't do anything. She just walks round, and we all feel polite. We feel just as if we were in a school, and the inquiring mother was fully satisfied. There is a class of persons by whom every observance of etiquette is considered to be a sign of weakness, hypocrisy, or subservient rule. They are the kind who, and disregard of one's companions and surroundings are, on the other hand, supposed to indicate strength, honesty, and independence. There could not be a greater mistake than to suppose that the individual and to the comfort of those about him. Politeness is as essential to life as oil to machinery, and it serves a similar purpose. Nothing is lost by it, and much is gained, and in many ways. It makes everything easier, quieter, quicker, more harmonious and more effective. It dispels friction, that great drawback in nearly every social condition, as well as in every piece of working mechanism. The refined, quiet, considerate and courteous man or woman has an immense physical, intellectual and social advantage over their fellows. In fact, the positive value of simple, every-day courtesy cannot be over-estimated. The development of courtesy is far more a matter of example than of precept. It cannot be taught from books or blackboards. It is felt, not reasoned about. It is given only in the form of object lesson. It is the heart even more powerful than the head. It is not a matter of demonstration so much as of experience. It is the finish, polish, luster, color, and beauty of the soul. It is the soft, tender, and otherwise disagreeable existence. ABSOLUTELY NOTHING LIKE IT. If any of our readers are missing THE MAGIC CITY Portfolios they are making a great mistake. This is the most beautiful and complete World's Fair Series published. Kirk Napier, a timberman, was shot in the neck and will probably die. Mere Napier, a merchant, was stabbed in three places and cannot recover. Mr. Aiken, a farmer, was shot in the left hip. Tom Maynard was cut seriously in the head. About twenty men took part, and several others were seriously injured.
