MARY HAWORTH

Teenager Can't Lighten Tense Mother's Burden

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I am a girl in the ninth grade quite concerned about my mother, without knowing how to help her.

My father recently entered a hospital, where the doctors are giving him many tests. My mother is about ready to pull out of this marriage, and I wish to know how to make things easier for her, whether or not she leaves him.

Since Dad has been sick, Mom has become very tired and extremely nervous. She is a very strong willed person, though frail in appearance, and shouldn't have to endure much more of all that's been going on, or she may collapse.

I would like to know some way that I can get her mind off her problems, so that she may have more fun. When she is around other adults, she is very charming, but when she is by herself she thinks only of how she is going to manage this situation. How can I help her? D.R.

DEAR D.R.: The Bible tells us to "bear ye one another's burdens." And this is your commendable desire in relation to your mother's anxieties at present.

However, it is virtually impossible for school - age children to lift adult - size crosses from their parents' shoulders, or ease or erase complicated tensions in which their parents are involved, in the adult areas of experience.

Most parents who have arrived at grown - up character, and are trying to do right by their children, keep the above-mentioned fact in mind, responsibly, and take care not to tear at the children's heartstrings and depress their spirits, uselessly, with a piteous air of desperation regarding personal (adult) trials.

Your urgent sense of maternal - type concern about your mother suggests that she is a pretty childish character, a taker rather than a giver in close emotional relationships. So does her halfway intent to walk out on her marriage, now that your dad is in the hospital.

Or maybe you've explained the situation badly. Maybe what she's talking about is taking the reins of family rule in her own hands, by getting salaried work, for example, and setting up housekeeping apart from your dad, assuming he's been an undependable provider.

In any case, if she is deeply tired, discouraged, despondent and jittery these days, worn down by prolonged stress and strain, it is her duty to the family, as well as to herself, to get medical advice and help immediately! — and to go after it on her own initiative, to tide her through the present crisis.

Now, going back to your sympathetic hope of finding "some way to help her get her mind off her troubles, so that she can have more fun," may I say, with all due respect for your tender solicitude that you are proposing a kind of "escapist" reaction, as a supposed remedy for her family headaches, whatever they are.

The fact is, family troubles encountered by adults should be faced - up to calmly, and dealt with courageously, in a spirit of hope and perseverance, if the person is to learn to take them in stride and get on with his growth—which seems to the basic purpose of living.

The practical recipe for getting problems off one's mind in adult years, is to reach a reasoned decision on what to do about them, and then proceed accordingly. As some philosopher has said, in effect: "There are two things we should never worry about: one, the thing we can help; the other, the thing we can't help."

P.S. Do you think there's a chance your mother might be helped by reading our discussion? M.H.

ELLEN'S DIARY

A Feathery Petalled Peony Shows Springtime Promise

"Today is so lovely. It's like a summer day" we offered to Gage this afternoon.

"It's warmer than some of our summer days were! And" he smiled, so happy to have it so, "it's just the day farmers have been waiting for — waiting too long, if I do say it. The granaries and cellars will be filling up today!"

We had been re - setting a peony that had been doing its best to give us fine springtime blossoms, despite the fact that it was being crowded by other plants out of its former location. A feathery - petaled pink and white it is, exceedingly attractive, though perhaps not so beloved by us as the old - fashioned crimson "piney-rose," which when in bloom ever reminds us of scenes from the years that were young. What sights return: We see an old garden. And close by an orchard in flower. Purple lilacs by a door. A horse - drawn seeder in a field, ducklings in a brook, a narrow footpath leads to school... the scent and sight of the smoking lime - kilns; and once more, with winter past, the sheen of the tides of the Strait.

We had reset the plant, noting the pink "eyes", a promise of springtime. And then, on impulse, was pleased to catch a ride with Gage (a grandson) on the little truck which was plying between field and granary. Alex and Peter were there also, had been since this fascinating fieldwork was undertaken. The route today led mostly by the road, which, of course, provided added interest, in that, as one said, "We never know what we may see there!"

"Could you stop just a minute till I see how that 'telephone man' climbed up that pole?" Peter begged of Gage a kind, patient fellow where child rearing are concerned, who did ease the truck briefly to allow the lad to watch a lineman at work.

"I'd like to watch longer" he sighed, when the machine picked up speed.

"Well, do you know it? So would I!" Gage smiled. "Yes, I'd like to stop longer there. But we have this grain to get in to the granary, and more to follow. We're actually in a rush this afternoon — you and I. Didn't you notice?" he grinned.

And the child nodded and smiled.

IDA BAILEY ALLEN

Cobbler Without Peer Ginger-Pear-Nut Treat

"IN THIS country, too many teenagers and young women stick - up - the nose at learning to cook!" commented the Chef. "I have given this sad situation considerable thought, Madame. And I have come to the conclusion that with many it is probably because cooking seems dull, stodgy, tiresome and ordinary — something to be learned to make the lives of others more pleasant — but never from the viewpoint of what good cooking can mean to themselves!

Living Alone

"Some young ladies, alas, do not marry. They live alone and have to prepare their own food. Even so, why should they fix a hurry - up, 1-23 meal, or TV dinner and gulp it down with finesse?"

"Right you are, Chef. Youthful good looks will begin to fade altogether too soon if young women do not eat balanced meals that tend to keep the skin young and clear, hair and nails in good condition, prevent over - weight and help to keep muscles supple.

"Most young women hope and expect to marry. How embarrassing it could be not to know how to cook. Yet that is what is happening to thousands of young wives and significantly divorce is at an all - time high!"

"Suppose the young lady marries a wealthy man," said the Chef. "He can afford a professional cook and expects his wife to supervise a fine table. Who is then going to oe the kitchen boss?"

Classes Available

"In the home, the lady should be able to instruct the cook. With cooking school classes available days and evenings at public schools, the Y.W.C.A. smart special private cooking courses available in many cities, there is no reason why any girl cannot learn to plan balanced meals, cook tasteful dishes, eat well herself and when she marries, deserve the shower of compliments that her husband, friends, even her mother - in - law will bestow."

THE COBBLER CONTROVERSY

In the past century, the word "cobbler" was often applied in cookery, to a one - crust fruit dessert, that looked rough or "cobbled up" on top when baked.

Sometimes pie pastry was used on the bottom with the fruit atop, sometimes the fruit was on the bottom topped with a pie pastry, biscuit or cakelike layer.

But it was not considered a success unless it looked casually roughed - up!

Here is our version of a new fruit cobbler we hope you will enjoy.

GINGERED-PEAR-NUT COBBLER

1 (1-lb.) can pears, drained and sliced
½ c. brownulated sugar
½ c. water
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. small - cut preserved ginger
¼ c. sugar (additional)
2 tbsp. butter or margarine (additional)
1 egg, well - beaten
1 c. sifted flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1-3 tsp. salt
½ tsp. ground ginger
½ c. milk
1-3 c. chopped nutmeats (any kind)

Combine first 4 ingredients; simmer 5 min. Add preserved ginger.

Meantime, for cake - like topping, mix together additional sugar, butter and egg; beat in alternately flour — sifted with baking powder, salt, ground ginger — and milk. Stir in nutmeats.

Pour hot pears into buttered deep 9 inch pie plate. Spoon over the topping. Don't try to keep it smooth or to cover pears.

Bake 30 to 35 min., in mod. oven, 350-375 degrees F., or until lightly browned and bubbling here and there. Serve warm with ice cream or hard sauce containing bits of preserved ginger.
