ELLEN'S DIARY

Trees Rattle Bare Bones Against Smokey Horizon

Someone has said, "Only a few notches remain on the time-stick of the year when Autumn brings corn in the shock, apples in the bin, hay in the mow, steers in the herd-bin. Geese are on the wing and in the bayous. Frost walks the valleys, and last summer's shade becomes a swirling shower of gold and crimson in the October wind. Haze smokes the sky-line and November rattles the door. The lantern lights the evening chores once more on the northern farm This year frays out. The hills are stark against the sky; trees are bare limbs and rattling branches."

Yes, sooner or later the November hills will be stark. But as yet the horses and cow-kind graze there as in summer, through the pastures are devoid of the low sweet clover, and wear now the tawny over-grass of the year's vesterday days.

Trees are bare limbs. Even the oak is almost naked, but all present striking pictures against the clear sunny blue of a November sky. And looking off up the valley, or down from a high field upon the scene spreading away to the far hills, one is reminded by the faded stubbles and the red of the "open" fields that as one might prepare for her sleep when the night-shadows enfold men, so the farmlands commence now to take on that look of season, which indicates that before long, these too wilt them into their required months of rest.

How eagerly the children anticipate the winter with its covering white blanket, its expanse for sledding and skiing, its iced outdoor ponds and its sheltering rinks!

Mack's letter to his mother from the first Atlantic Winter Fair came early this week. It was obvious the lad's pen had been dipped in the ink of affection, with thoughts homing fondly to those left behind in the house across the lane: to his one brother, to the sister to with a brotherly license sometimes teases, to Peter whose third birthday was observed yesterday, and to Alex, the six-year chap, who must attend school without his elder brother's company throughout the days of this week.

"When I find the time for it" he wrote "I'll round up some souvenirs for you-all" And in a thought which went on to the season ahead he reminded his mother, "See that Alex gets to practice his hockey, say, for a half-hour each day. That should help improve his shot."

For young and older hocky is indeed Canada's National game"

But not yet would we care to see the rime of frost on the hills, or hear the trees rattling bones. Instead we wish for continuing autumnal on the shelf and against the horizons, mellow sunshine, warming days. And nights such as this one, calm and mild, which November hangs against the widowpanes.

"A nice day we had" Curiosity purrs, glancing at the old clock on the shelf and making his way to the door. "Soon be closing-time, eh? he grins.

Until tomorrow — — Diary — Good-night.....

MARY HAWORTH

Behavior Of Young Wife Is Immature And Nasty

Dear Mary Haworth: I am hoping you can help me change my ways before I lose my wonderful husband and all my friends.

You see, I am a self-centered brat. I am an only child and was spoiled rotten.

I've known for some time what a miserable person I am, but I just didn't care. Now I see I am hurting those I love and myself. I don't really want to hurt anyone but I can't seem to help myself.

If I don't get my own way I am just awful to anyone who gets in my way. And if I do get my way I am miserable because I have hurt someone.

I sometimes have moods when I can't stand myself and swear I will change. But, unfortunately, these moods don't last long. I am in such a mood now and have just decided to get help from someone other than family or friends. I've asked them for help but don't get any.

I have told my husband and parents that unless they put their feet down and demand a change I know I'll just go on being the same. I really do wish to become a nicer person but I can't do it by myself.

I am not religious so please don't recommend pastoral counsel. Also I don't care to confide in friends. Please try to help me; or tell me how to get help. Thank you.

Dear D.Y.: As I get the picture, you are in the doghouse at home, disbarred from your husband's good graces for the time being. And with a forlorn feeling that he seems no longer to care very much about healing the rift.

I surmise that your immediate urge to reform is strong — not so much because you yearn to be nicer and to make others happier, but rather because you are beginning to realize the ruinous cost to yourself of being an adult-age brat.

Very likely the motivating intent of your will-to-reform is still entirely self-serving, in the sense that you'd like to head off the bill for bitchiness. But even so, it may lead to a turn for the better, eventually.

Your cry for help, your sense of total dependency upon parents, husband, friends, possibly even a counsellor, to save you from yourself, is the cry of a child (rather an "arrested case"), who hasn't been taught deep interior (ingrained) responsibility for behaving well.

In short, as of now, you are wholly unself-disciplined, an habitual state which amounts to total evasion of your adult-age duties and obligations in the field of human relations.

At your age, consistent psychological (or emotional) self-control, or call it sane self-management is a moral necessity: an indispensable element of healthful maturer (or maturing) character, And it is a missing element in your character to date; and an element that none but you can produce for you. It has to be brought into being by you, or it simply won't exist.

Your urgent insistence, at this writing, that somebody else, not you, must put the brakes on your intemperate behavior, or your being insufferably unfair to those whose devotion you need and daren't forfeit, is just about the ultimate statement of infantile irresponsibility.

It is the sort of illogical outlandish demandingness that one might expect to encounter in a mental patient in a custodial hospital, but it has no place in ordinary family life and routine social exchange.

Quite obviously, the only possibility of saving yourself from progressive demoralization and the creeping destruction of all your hopes of happiness, is to check in with a good psychologist or analyst, for emergency guidance in mastering the techniques of comfortably self - imposed, wisely considerate self-control.
