LETTER FROM SEBASTOPOL.

The following Letter from the camp before Sebastopol, has been kindly handed to us for publication.

Camp before Sebastopol,
August 9th, 1855.

Beloved Father and Mother;

It is with feelings of heartfelt gratitude to the Almighty for the preservation of my life amidst innumerable perils since my arrival in these regions of death or inevitable ruin, as you have either to encounter sickness or wounds, or in all probability a total change of everything, from your arrival in the Crimea until fate may destine you for some other mode of life, than that of abject misery, not to mention the many dangers and hardships that a British soldier is exposed to; still his manly spirit supports him in his hours of pain, of which I dare not pretend to relate as I am confident, it would be worse than useless for me to attempt giving you a detail. In a word, our hardships are great, they far exceed the seven labours of Hercules, at present; should they end at this point we shall consider ourselves happy, as I am led to believe, that the grand crisis has now arrived, the hour is at hand when we shall behold that proud City in ruins, with its ramparts, towers and battlements which have proudly bidden defiance to us during a long siege. I am sorry to say it is not in my power to give you that news which I would wish, however what I may fall short in this you may very soon expect to hear of cheering news from the vigilant besiegers. I am confident you have heretofore heard of our attack on the Mamelon Fort on the 7th of June, and of our complete annihilation of the Russians on that night; also of their night attack on our advanced works, from which they are always driven with a severe loss; you have also heard of the unfortunate affair on the 18th of June, when our Army lost about 2000 in killed and wounded; the 38th regiment lost on that day about 163 men in killed and wounded. Our force was very weak on that day as our Brigade consisted only of five Regiments, namely: 9th, 18th, 28th, 38th and 44th; the 18th, 38th and 44th advanced to attack the Russian rifle-pits on our right and left, from which we soon dislodged them, but very few of them returned to their beloved Sebastopol to relate their morning adventure. We advanced through the Cemetery under the deadliest fire ever experienced by the British army. As five Russian batteries together with the Russian shipping played a deadly game on us, we had nothing to repel their cannon shot, shell, grape, canister, rockets and grenades, but true heroic valour, added to an unerring rifle and practised eye; after 18 hours' hard fighting exposed to the many privations attendant on warfare, we had to retire, still we did not leave, until we set fire to a large portion of the suburbs of Sebastopol, this was the only yard of ground gained that day either by English or French, and we know the utility of this hard fought piece of land (the property of deceased Russians.) I assure you we were sorry to disturb those peaceful slumbers of the tomb, but sorry to say long ere many of my brave brothers in arms beheld that brilliant morning sun, which rose in such splendour, to set, they were lying mingling their blood with the native occupants, of that sacred spot. On the next day, we performed the last sad rites to those sons of Britain who fell without a murmur. We have had a few night attacks from the Russians, they were repelled as usual; they are now shelling our camp, as they see we disregard them in our trenches, they commenced this cowardly work yesterday; they shall rue it, as we have assured their city this long time, but in a few days' time we shall salute them on all sides with deadly missiles, as we are to spare nothing Russian. We expect siege operations will commence on the 18th or 20th instant if not previous to that date. I now conclude for the present.

I remain your affectionate and devoted son until death,

William Hormsly.
