MARY HAWORTH

Girl's In-Laws Descend Like Locusts In Summer

Dear Mary Haworth: My daughter has a problem which I hope you can help you solve before the end of July. You see, her husband's parents are to see them for several months every summer. They live in Arizona and spend the time to pay their way, their extended stays are a considerable strain on her budget. Also my daughter has four children, which makes eight to cook and a husband for during these visits. My daughter feels as if her husband should take it is too much for her, but he won't.

Another daughter-in-law has them for just two weeks. This was arranged after a terrible fight with her husband. She asks them to visit before September, as she is a teacher. Last week they visited her just as school started.

They spend most time at my daughter's, who has the largest family. How can she do right by her husband and treat his parents with respect (as she wants to) when they treat her as if they are the place of convenience. "And if all goes well - doesn't come in too dry. You know, there'll be a great crop of grain! The fields are a promising - never saw such look better."

Sunset flamed, dewfall a and the dusk came from the afternoon. And exquisite moonlight. "It's so pretty a night. I have my regrets over wasting it to you." Mac said, facing off those moments ago to his bed. Good! tomorrow - "Diary - Goodnight."

ELLEN'S DIARY

An Early Morning Fog Is Promise Of Warm Day

"Will there be sunshine to day?" we asked at breakfast. Our carpenter comes down and join us at the meal, from that room beneath the eaves, which overflows with and steam. The window is wide and quiet. Sunlight beams in there, as the day spends away, and there too moonlight loves to linger, spotlighting its silver sheen across the bed. It was our favorite bedroom in summer, before a second window was inserted in that above the kitchen to the drawer which James is content being that it was out of sight and sound of the barn. "It doesn't matter where the other rooms are situated" we overheard him remark not long ago to another of the proposed layout of a farmhouse, but it's worth a lot to the owner to have the kitchen - yes, and his bedroom too, within sight and sound of the barn. "You're out of hearing of the stock at night through the window and spring. It can often mean a loss, when the young stock are coming. It's then," he nodded, "the signs are to be heard for."

But the sound of the waterfalls at the spillways comes up there, fresh and clear. There, in summers now long gone we could, in a wakaful spell, hear the right sound of a passing, and carriage on the road. And sometimes in a sound so wild, it took us, the while to come on a nod from homes from some young excursion, which had kept us on into the wet and hot. And to waken one in the morning, and the wives planned to let it stay in the parlor-chimney close by.

"It's likely, Ellen, there'll be sun today," James remarked. "Yes!" the carpenter agreed. "There was fog earlier. After that you can expect sun and a warmth."

"Any flower on the timothy this morning?" we queried. "A thought at the haying ahead." "A little, perhaps," James replied.

"It's after the third flowering, you know, isn't it?" "I used to be!" James said. "But nowadays we can't seem to walk so long."

There was a silence. A cow lowed down in the pasture and stepped to nurse her calf. Scamper harked at an outgoing car against the road-hill.

"Guess we'll need more shingles," the carpenter offered. "I'm sure taking an amount to cover this roof!" It's dormers and a veranda, and all.

"Old houses must have taken a lot of building in their day," James said. "And they've seen a lot of living," we remembered. "After all, that's what molasses does."
