

[FOR THE EXAMINER.]

TO —

When mine eyes, long dimm'd with constant weeping,
In the still and silent dust are sleeping;
When above my cold, clay, lifeless bed,
The gentle breeze shall wave the willow's head,
And thou art left a lone, lone maid,
Think, think of me, love!

When the queen of Spring with warmer showers,
Comes to deck the earth in gayest flowers;
When the days become both long and bright,
And countless stars shine with the moon at night,
Scenes such as these may cause delight,
But thou wilt think of me, love!

When the sown corn in every field is springing,
And the evening birds with sweetest notes are singing;
When tiny humming tribes oft come and go,
And swallows flit on light wings to and fro,
And thy very hopes seem buried low,
Thou wilt think of me, love!

When 'neath June's gay azure skies,
Choice violets ope their varied eyes;
When gold-tinged moss hides my low mound,
And lengthened grass, points, there's the ground,
And thou no faithful friend hast found,
Then think of me, love!

When the meadows show in carpets red and white,
And dew-drops glisten with the morning light;
When roses scent the air, in sweetest bloom,
And lonely ones unblown grow o'er my tomb,
Then think of Death—the universal doom—
And one last thought for me, love!

Each bud to thee, shall seem a silent token,
Of a fond heart chilled, bereft and broken;
When thou dost think of days that passed with gladness,
Thy heart may grieve with thought and sadness;
Thou may'st then say, what blinded madness,
And heave a sigh for me, love!

When thou dost rove where blooms the hether,
Thou'lt mind our evening walks together;
Perhaps thou'lt strew, with silent weeping,
The lonely, mouldering grave, where I am sleeping,
And sadly mourn for me, love!
