THE ENGINEER'S BI-WEEKLY

Horny The Engineer Says...

Engineering students are arrogant.

I've been told so many times this week, so I guess it's true. Actually, I'm proud to admit it. What does it mean to be arrogant? Arrogant people brook no incompetence. For those people who don't realize it yet, engineering students who successfully complete their degree have a heavy mantle of responsibility to bear. They can only screw up once. Responsibility also extends to the work of those under them, so toleration of incompetence is suicidal weakness.

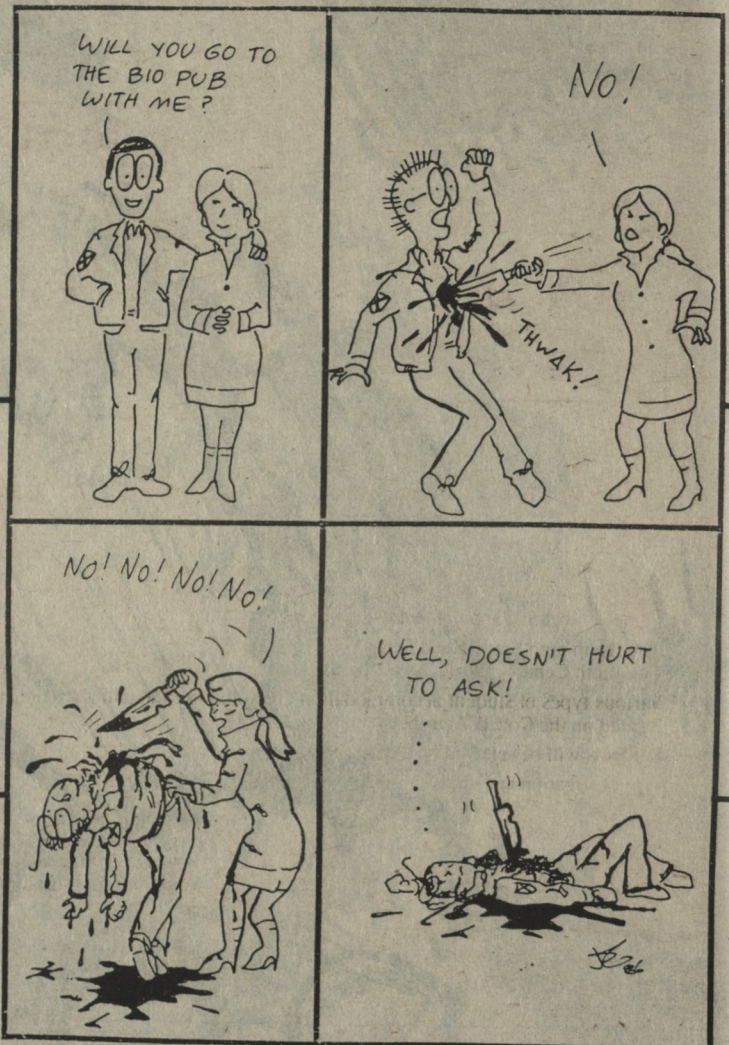

Arrogant people automatically take the lead, be it in school spirit, in having a good time, in responsibility. If engineers were sheepish followers, they wouldn't be able to create the technological innovations necessary to carry our society into the next century. They wouldn't even be able to coordinate the projects necessary to keep our world running. Without the arrogance to promote it, how would they get the simplest projects developed from idea to completed fact.

Arrogant people have confidence in their accomplishments. If you aren't sure what you've done is right, why risk other people's money measure arena or lives.

If engineering students weren't arrogant, they couldn't be engineers.
