Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Travelling over the atrocious roads of our forefather's day was anything but a pleasant experience. During the summer months the traveller was choked and dust-covered and pestered with mosquitoes and flies from the undrained marshes; in winter he waded through gigantic snowdrifts and often faced the peril of being lost and frozen to death in the primeval forests. Secondary roads are none too good today but then they were little more than cart paths and even the main roads were often full of quagmires in which a wheeled vehicle easily became bogged. To lose oneself in unfamiliar surroundings was quite a common disaster, for there were not signposts to point the traveller in the right direction.

Even at a later period when there were regular stage coach services between Charlottetown and other populated areas the absence of guideposts was a source of great annoyance to strangers who were obliged to travel from town to town. When the Rev. Francis Metherwill and Bishop MacEachern missionaries they often had to trust themselves to the guidance of young farmers familiar with the country. Bears were quite numerous and often the traveller on foot had to carry a gun to protect himself against these fierce creatures. Most country folk did little travelling and some never went beyond the immediate surroundings of their district.

Bridges were few and many small streams had to be forded, a proceeding that was quite dangerous when the floods of spring swept across the Island.

With all these difficulties to be faced, it is not surprising that journeys were limited so far as possible to summer. The winter traveller who struggled through the deep snow, crossed frozen streams and river exposing himself to frost bite and the danger of being suddenly caught in a blinding snow storm. Indeed to venture forth on a journey of any length in winter called for robust health and plenty of courage. Yet all these hardships were not enough to stop the travelling Islander when duty or pleasure called him out.

There was a constant coming and going at the inns, for whose comfort and cheapness the Island then enjoyed quite a reputation.

Horseback was the commonest method of travel, and it remained the fastest, if not the most comfortable, even when stage travel had become well established. Those who could not afford horses or stage fares used shank's mare or went in carts some of which accommodated passengers as well as goods.

But those times were gone for
