Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN

When we see a titidel, or read about one, we forthwith think of something or someone to be defended. And we ask what is that for which citadels are built and maintained. Is it not personality? We wish to protect human beings.

There are many citadels in any social order worth the name. The most important is, I think we will all agree, the home. But there are others outside the home and which guard its very approach. The home is our most important citadel, because life begins there and the children are under its supervision and protection for a number of years.

We may readily see that what we call Law is one of these outposts. So we have the protection of the police, for protection is a prime necessity. Sometimes we find that officers who have to do with the administration of law do not get the respect which they should command. Juvenile crime is on the increase, and the robbing of stores and banks at the point of a gun are events all too common. The home is the world in miniature, and it is the place where discipline should begin and be maintained. The sad and disgusting thing is that children grow and have far too much of their own way. The result is that later in life the law of the land has to deal with them without gloves.

Another outpost is the church. Wordsworth in a little poem addressed to Lady Fleming—a poem dealing with the church, says the churches of England are her only citadels. In another poem called Devotional Incitements he says that the function of the church is to unsensualize the mind. While the home comes first in importance in the matter of human training, it could not get on very well without the help of the church. One side the other in this important matter.

There are other outposts and the school is one. In it the course of study should not be left to Utility alone. The old idea and that which Newman advocates in his Idea of a University is that the arts course in a college is at the basis of all. So here the disciplines, classics and mathematics have a place. The professional schools—those for medicine, law and for technicians come later. The end seen should not be just mercenary.

The real citadel is the home—more important than church or school. The ideal home should to a certain extent be both—a school and a church. Parenthood may be too lax, and ostentatious, to use Horace Bushnell's expressive phrase, may be all too common, and inevitably with bad results.

There is no such thing as bringing up children by proxy. Of course good houses in which to live are a necessity and right ideas should be taught there. If the home falls, the state will follow as surely as night follows day. Luxury will not do.

We hear a good deal about our high standard of living. What are its elements? Luxury cannot take the place of the inculcation of the virtues and the minor moralities. Biography shows that from very humble homes have come great men—men who have climbed to dizzy heights, showing that the old text, "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth", is correct and is borne out by the record of after years.

What is the conversation at the table? Is it any more than common gossip? Reference to the opinion of others, modulation of the voice, courtesy—all these may seem to be just trifles, but go far to the making and shaping of a good life.

We hear in our day about forward movements, why not have one to rehabilitate the home—our prime citadel of defence. The lack of discipline, the wave of crime are too closely related to pass unnoticed.

Let me close with a quotation from that classic book by Horace Bushnell—Christian Culture—"Let every Christian father and mother understand, when their child is three years old, that they have done more than half of all they will ever do for his character."

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

No history could give to posterity a clearer knowledge of our daily life and our customs of living than the advertising pages of our modern newspapers. They are a precise record of what we are doing and wearing; how we are entertained; what we are using—what we want and what we have to offer for sale.

The first printing from movable type (about 1445) was an abundance of Bibles. Then followed the first worthwhile European literature. Language cast off a great deal of its dialect. It became polished, literary, more and more books appeared on the market as they had once been. Today all the world reads. Paper as we know it originated in China. The Chinese used paper as early as the 2nd century B.C. But it was not until the 14th century that good quality paper was made in Europe.

Traces of marriage by captive are found among many primitive races and if you will turn to Numbers XXXI, 7-9, also Deuteronomy XXI you'll get a full description of marriage by captive as practiced among the Israelites.

Traces of this ancient custom may still be seen in the runaway bride and groom whose elopement never fails to make good copy. They were 28,591 twins born in the U.S.A. in 1950; 290 triplets and eight quadruplets, but no quintuplets. It is interesting to note that of the 2,738,500 births recorded, 3,560 were born of mothers between the ages of ten and fourteen years.

Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan (Copyright)

All through this month of October, since that Sunday evening when Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip first arrived in Canada, the heart of the nation has been joyous and light and proud. It is the joy of hospitality which, though always ours, is quickened when we welcome such great personages. It is the lightness of heart which accompanies genuine love and good will. It is the pride of a people in the person who some day will be their Queen.

There are those who are puzzled by our enthusiasm for the King and his family, and who even openly suggest that royalty is out of date, and that our veneration is directed to relics of a glorious but incongruous institution. Those especially who have not been raised in the tradition of monarchy are at a loss to understand. Yet for those who do understand, whose response to the Princess' visit is spontaneous and genuine, what richness, what nobly enlarging experiences is added to their lives!

In these days of wars and rumors of wars, of factions and feuds, of political disorder and social unrest, the British Throne stands as a symbol of peace, unity and stability. Within Great Britain itself there may be differences beneath the Throne. But all look from party policy to the Ruler who is above party as a symbol of unity. In the King the nation is always united, and when we extend our view to the Commonwealth, we see in the same King one-sixth of the world united. Here at least, in this aching, tattered world, there is unity and there is peace.

All authority is from God. This is the lesson that Christ taught us when He Himself faced the judgment of civil authority. The great respect our Lord had for civil power, even that which was to a degree unjust, is an important lesson for us, who have the precious blessing of civil power which is benign and just and more closely reflecting that Power from which it comes. In our reverence for the King and for his daughter it is not merely their human qualities which we respect, for in these they are not different from other men. No, it is our reverence for the authority in our land, for something God has given. It is an exercise of the virtue of piety by which we render honor and respect to our superiors.

In the code of civil ethics respect is given to such things as the flag, monuments, historic sites, and the like. The reason is that these symbolize or summarize the nation, and provide a focus of national consciousness and an object by which patriotism can find expression. This is as it should be, for how otherwise could there be spirit and unity in a nation? But is it more excellent to find this focus, this subject, in a person which is the highest point of civilization, the greatest of God's works? If love of country is a good thing, is there any better way of expressing it than by investing it in the supreme creature, man?

Nor does this relegate the office of King to that of mere figurehead in the common acceptance of that term. Because the nation is summed up and embodied in a person, citizens are able to receive an acknowledgment of their love of country. The expression of patriotism is not terminated by a lifeless thing. Moreover, that the King rules entirely in accordance with the will of the people is a very excellent condition. It means democracy. And because it is the Monarch who finally approves legislation, law has thereby the prestige and solemnity that only personal and august moderation can impart.

And, too, we are reminded of those words of Pascal which express a truth so fundamental to human nature. "The heart has reasons about which the mind knows nothing." Our adherence to the Throne, our reverence for the King, our great joy at the visit of Princess Elizabeth and her husband are not merely a matter of strict logic. There is something about royalty, about anointed majesty which realizes a fundamental aspiration in human nature.

The desire for something great beyond oneself, for glory, majesty and power in which one shares, are satisfied in kingship. Nor does our gaze rest in the human King, but passes beyond to the King of Kings, whose throne is heaven and whose footstool is the earth. An earthly king is a type and shadow of the heavenly King, and thus a means by which our minds and hearts are raised to God.

Tomorrow, throughout the Catholic world, is celebrated the Feast of Christ the King. Christ as King of the world would mean "a kingdom of truth and life, of holiness and grace, of justice, love and peace." We who have the privilege of paying reverence to an earthly king can readily appreciate the excellence and grandeur of this
