ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

This morning in rural places, in villages tucked snugly at crossroads or it may be in some quieter spot of countryside, schools that have been deserted and lonely since the holiday season took their students away from them will swing wide their doors once more to welcome their return. These will summon them from many a delight of vacation, back to the routine of classes with the accompanying pleasantries and concerns.

It will be well with us at this House "in the road" from Alderlea, Jamie will make it his responsibility to rise early this morning, to have done in good time for school those duties of the choring that are his. Soberly he will hurry the younger fellow about his preparations as he gathers the books, the pencils and lunches required for the first day there. We shall appreciate that he will be just a little excited with the prospects for today leaving behind him the tasks of the earlier grades to those who must follow in his footsteps, he will come to classes in the senior room.

He will entertain his regrets at leaving the Teacher with whom, to our mind he has made excellent progress in his studies, and who, in the years of her stay has given him every encouragement and help, filling as she indeed has, kindly and well, that place in a student's life which repays her with a lasting esteem and respect. Some pupils we have known who have not been nearly so fortunate.

"And where's...? a vacationing son, gray now and a bit portly inquired not long ago of a certain country school ma'am we both knew.

"Dead!" we said, with never a qualm.

"She should have died before she was licensed to teach!" he nodded. "Do you know, Ellen — I wasn't what one would call a slow or disagreeable pupil... I grant I may have been a little mischievous; but honest to heaven, all the time she taught in our school I never got one kind or encouraging word from her — not one to remember! And you'll never know," he continued with obvious lingering little-boy hurt, "how much I often longed for one! When I look back to my schooldays... well," he chuckled, "I might have been one of the best educated men in..."

"The world," we smiled.

"Well, let's not take in quite so much territory," he laughed, "let's say The Island, if she had just shown me some understanding and given me the odd kind word. What a far-reaching and enduring influence one way or another teachers bear on their taught!"

And so this morning, Jamie will commence classes with a new but not a strange teacher, one whom to know as he does, is to give him nice anticipations of the school-year ahead.

Gage, on his own responsibility then, also looks forward happily to the term for will there not be, as he says, "dear little ones," to fill now that place to which a year ago he

Fashions Not A Problem To Those Who Wear Saris

By Mary E. James (Toronto Globe and Mail)

Fashions in saris never change and some of the Ceylon women have large wardrobes of very lovely ones collected over the years which they take pride in passing along to succeeding generations.

At a tea for ACWW delegates Mrs. De Mel was wearing a beautiful sari of pale blue chiffon with hand-blocked border of Persian design.

As a necklace, she wore a gold chain which had belonged to her family since the days the men most of whom have now adopted Western dress — wore these as garlands around their sarongs.

Ceylon is very proud of the fact that it gained its political independence within the British Commonwealth in 1948 by constitutional means, without bloodshed.

she said, and that the many races and religions which make up the 5,500,000 of the island's population worked together towards independence.

"The fact that Ceylon is on the sea route of the world and has always had contact with other nations probably accounts for our ability to adapt ourselves to change," she said.

Recalling that the island was occupied by the Dutch, also the Portuguese, for 150 years each before the British came, Mrs. De Mel said influence of Dutch culture still remains in Ceylon's laws, architecture and food, especially in places like her native city of Galle.

She was interested, she said, when she went to the ACWW Amsterdam conference to see things unfamiliar to her since childhood. She found patterns of

Elderly Philanderers

Should These Doddering Lotharios Carry A Doctor's Certificate?

DEAR MISS DIX: A man of our town, who had been suffering from heart trouble for a long time, died of an attack when in his car with his stenographer. The resultant publicity brought humiliation and suffering of the families of the man and the girl, and the girl consequently left town. She had known nothing of the man's physical condition. Had the wife been able to talk to her and explain matters, the tragedy possibly could have been averted. If the "other woman" is a reasonable person, the wife's co-operation in a case like this might have discouraged the girl.

A NOVEL IDEA
ANSWER: You certainly offer a Utopian suggestion for triangular living; but I doubt if it will ever find favor with the parties involved. I can't quite see a wife sweetly calling up her rival and presenting a full description of the erring husband's ailments.

The unromantic details of John's latest attack of indigestion might have more effect in quelling the ardor of his "other wife" than an appeal to her sense of fair play. Perhaps the campaign for "a doctor's certificate for every philanderer" would win favor with wives, but I'm sure the doddering Lotharios would be

Morning Smile

When the American composer, George Gershwin, died, a man of sentiment combined with musical aspirations wrote an elegy in his honor. He sought out Oscar Levant. Reluctantly Levant granted him a hearing. Eagerly the man rendered the piece with his own hands and then turned expectantly toward Levant, seeking approbation. "I think it would have been better," Levant said, "if you had died and Gershwin had written the elegy."

CHILDREN'S OWN TABLETS

That Body Of Yours

By James W. Barton, M.D.

FLOATING OR DROPPED KIDNEY

As a youngster, when I heard about someone having a floating kidney, I pictured a kidney floating about in some fluid in the body. I learned later that a floating kidney was often one that was not held up by fat. Most of us have seen the kidneys in the portions of cattle and pigs, how they are embedded in fat, so when an individual, from prolonged illness or from dieting, lost so much fat which was holding up the kidney, one or both kidneys had fallen or were "floating."

What about the individual in whom a kidney or kidneys are not securely held in place in abdomen because of loss of fat? This falling of the kidney is called ptosis, just as we know of ptosis of upper eyelid or ptosis of organs the abdomen.

In the Journal of Urology kidneys, bladder, generative organs, Baltimore, Drs. A. F. Kaminsky, R. B. Roth, and E. Hess state that the normal kidney has an average of motion up to a couple of inches; movement of more than two inches is considered to be unusual. Reviewing 241 cases of abnormal kidney motility (movement) seen over a period of five years, these physicians feel that kidney ptosis, if not complicated, does not require a surgical operation to hold the kidney up in its proper position in the abdomen.

Naturally, when a kidney drops down out of place, the patient is often aware of this "mass" in abdomen and may believe it is a growth of some kind, perhaps cancer, "but under ordinary circumstances, reassurance is more to the point than fastening the kidney up in place by surgery."

However, when, because the falling down of the kidney results in the bending of the kidney so that it interferes with its various excretory out poisons and wastes from the blood, and the flowing of urine into the bladder so that there is a stoppage or slowing up of the action of the work being done

THIS day's configurations favor the daring and the original, so it would be an excellent time for which to take enthusiastic action on plans and projects temporarily stymied during the recent adverse period. Look, too, for new spheres of activity which you feel will further your career or increase your personal prestige.

There are ideal aspects for congeniality during the evening hours, so that social activities shared with friends and loved ones should be exceptionally stimulating. Courtship, and romance are also under a high aspect, and plans made to travel at this time should culminate successfully.

For the Birthday
