

Closer U.S., British Ties Are Suggested By Wilson

LONDON (AP)—Prime Minister Wilson has suggested that a common British-American interest in bringing stability and security to vast areas of the East would lead to development of "an even closer relationship" between London and Washington.

On the first anniversary of his assumption of power, the Labor prime minister shrugged off reports that the United States is becoming jittery over the outcome of Britain's current defence review.

The British are working on plans for a new military setup east of Suez, in consultation with such countries as the U.S., Australia and New Zealand. One object would be to offer safeguards and protection to any non-nuclear states which might fear blackmail or even attack by nuclear powers.

Wilson, in an interview, suggested that Britain's aim is to internationalize her nuclear weapons resources — her H-bombs and her developing flotilla of Polaris missile-carrying submarines—not only for the defence of Europe, but also to defend great areas east of Suez.

"It is not exactly easy to say how this will be done," the prime minister said. "This must depend on progress in discussions for improving defence co-operation in the areas concerned."

Wilson offered little elaboration of his statement about common British-American interests east of Suez. He did say that "fullest consultation" would take place with the U.S., the Commonwealth partners and Britain's NATO allies before any final decisions are reached in such matters as Britain's defence commitments in Asia, including the future of Britain's Singapore base.

An element of uncertainty about Britain's plans was injected by a statement this week from an opposition Conservative party spokesman at the party's annual convention at Brighton. He suggested Britain might abandon her global defence role, notably east of Suez, and concentrate on immediate interests revolving about defence of Western Europe.

CORRECT IMPRESSION
Evidently in an effort to counteract the impression this left, former prime minister Sir Alec Douglas-Home told the convention, Friday no Conservative government ever would scuttle Britain's worldwide responsibilities and allow "a greedy aggressor to fill the vacuum."

Wilson's remarks about common U.S.-British interests in the East came after he was asked whether a new kind of "special relationship" might evolve between Britain and the U.S.

"I've always tended to avoid the phrase 'special relationship,'" Wilson replied. "I think we have a close relationship."
