Safe Soothing Satisfying

Originated by an Old Family Physician in 1810.

You can safely trust what time has indorsed for nearly a century.

There is not a medicine in use today which possesses the confidence of the public to so great an extent as Johnson's Anodyne Liniment. For more than eighty years it has stood upon its own intrinsic merit, while generation after generation have used it. The best evidence of its value is the fact that in the state where it originated the sale of it is steadily increasing.

Johnson's Anodyne Liniment

I. S. JOHNSON, ESQ. My Dear Sir:—Fifty years ago this month, your father, Dr. Johnson, called at my store and left me some Johnson's Anodyne Liniment on sale. I have sold it ever since. I can most truly say that it has maintained its high standard and popularity from that time to this. JOHN B. RAND, North Waterford, Maine, Jan., 1891.

"Best Liver Pill Made."

Parsons' Pills

Positively cure Biliousness and Sick Headache, liver and bowel complaints. They expel all impurities from the blood. Delicate women find relief from using them. Price 25c; five $1. Sold everywhere.

This certifies that Dr. A. Johnson, whose name is signed to every genuine bottle of Johnson's Anodyne Liniment, in the month of Jan. 1840, first left at my store some of the same I have supplied my customers with it ever since, (over fifty years) with increasing sales. scrofula

Any doctor will tell you that Professor Hare, of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, is one of the highest authorities in the world on the action of drugs. In his last work, speaking of the treatment of scrofula, he says:

"It is hardly necessary to state that cod-liver oil is the best remedy of all. The oil should be given in emulsion, so prepared as to be palatable."

He also says that the hypophosphites should be combined with the oil.

Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil, with hypophosphites, is precisely such a preparation.

BEYOND THE FRONTIER

BY H. C. ABBOTT.

"He's got the legs of the lot!"

"Shavaj, William!"

"That's a good 'un! I believe the beggar's got a ground up near his outpost and plays with those tribes of his!"

"When he isn't plaiyng with his own life—just like him."

The speakers were by the side of a polo ground at an up country station in India, and were criticising the play of Capt. William Strachan, a gentleman the nature of whose duties precluded him from anything more than an occasional enjoyment of the society of his countymen. It was allotted to him to sit in the gate of British influence, at the extreme outpost of the hill frontier to wit, with an absurdly insufficient force, and to see that there was no infringement of British interests nor disregard of governmental authority offered at the hands of the turbulent and treacherous tribes with whom the indulgence in such misdemeanor was merely a matter of opportunity. It was six years about since his predecessor was done for, and the natives ascribed his protracted existence to the exercise of occult powers. Yet his only expedient in the face of danger, that his friends knew of was that of getting well into the middle of it without loss of time, so that his fellow-officials, while growing gradually less surprised to hear of his being still alive, were always prepared to hear of his demise.

It was difficult to get an idea of the man's appearance while he was dodging about on one of his numerous and noted ponies, but the quality and pace of his play bore out the reputation of his prowess.

From time to time one caught the glint of the steel-gray eye that contrasted so markedly with his black eyebrows and mustache, and the tan of his handsome but severe face. The impetuous character of his play was evidenced by the sound of his voice now and then, and at last led to an incident in the game.

The captain had got the ball, and was bringing it down the side of the ground with a good piece of daylight between him and his pursuers. It was his favorite phrase of the game, and he was keenly enjoying it. His run seemed sure of success, and he was turning the ball to the centre prior to his final drive for the goal, when the head of his stick split in two and the ball pursued an erratic course toward the goal keeper.

A full ripe expletive, in consonance with the exasperation of a sportsman, broke from him, and directly it had done so he saw that he could have touched a lady at the side of the ground with the remnant of the stick.

He flushed with annoyance, for he did not see an English lady so often that he was disposed to insult her when he did. Despite the shame he felt, he noticed how handsome she was, and how startled at his unfortunate self-commission, nor was he inclined to make less of his regret when the man standing with her broke into a mocking sort of laugh at her confusion. He pulled at his pony's head until he started the blood in its mouth, and, wheeling the pretty little beast round on its haunches, came back to where she was still standing.

"Accept my most humble apology, madam!"

That was all he said, and then rode back into the game, but not to play as he had done before.

He had a further opportunity of qualifying his conduct a little later on, for the companion of the lady introduced first himself as the newly arrived commissioner, and then the lady herself as his wife, and the captain, who had been nursing with secret satisfaction the intention of kicking this same person for his ill seasoned levity abandoned his project.

"I'm only a poor jungle wallah, Mrs. Norville," he said the first time they were alone, "so my friends make allowances for me when I come back into civilization, and you must, too."

And he thought it good of her to listen to him and show an interest when he spoke modestly, but with unconscious force of his lonely and hazardous life.

Social routine in the cold weather brought the residents of the station a great deal together, but not by any means too much so for the captain, as it nearly always entailed his meeting Mrs. Norville. They were good friends from the first, as she naively remarked a few evenings after they first came together, when he hung back from a game that he joyed in so that he might sit by her in the dusk under the gardenias on the tennis lawn.

He did not attempt to gauge this friendship until one of his older chums prefaced a conversation with the seemingly vague remark "that it was making talk," and then proceeded to explain his meaning, which was simple. The captain grew wroth for a moment, and threatened the talkers with drastic treatment, but a little reflection told him that this was a poor expedient for silencing people. Then the light in which he really regarded her dawned on him, troubling him greatly, but it refused to grow less on consideration.

The necessity for caution was apparent at once, and he acted upon it in a manner natural to him, but without tact, for he was not at home in his difficulty and its circumstances.

Although he would have to temper his attentions considerably, yet to absent himself entirely from her society would be, he felt, too noticeable, so he compromised the matter by exchanging formal greetings, and then feasting his eyes on her from somewhere in her immediate contiguity.

Abstention merely whetted his appetite, but despite this he resolutely endeavored to destroy a sentiment that he held as discreditable both to himself and to her, until the same friend who had first spoken to him about her told him her story.

"Who she was," said his informant, from a hammock in the captain's bungalow, "in the first place, no one out here knows. He married her last year, when on his leave, and brought her out with him. What she is and has been, very few know either, but I do. You've heard of Harman Norville's ability and cleverness, eh?"

The captain nodded. "Well, believe it all and some more, too; square the quantity, and you may arrive at something of the wickedness of the man. I'm not going to specify his vices, but he's got all I know of anyway. No one ever saw him drunk during the day—his court work's ideal—but he's drunk pretty well every night of his life by midnight, and I should never have shared that information with his khansama if I hadn't worked with him by ourselves once in Badulipur, and found them both drunk together. His man split over the business to me when his sahib was off on one of his 'overwork' trips. As for his other frailties, you and I both know the country, its people and their ways, but not half as well as he does. Most of us thought marriage would cure him of those two things at least, but it hasn't, even with that girl. Now you know why Mrs. Norville's life isn't a happy one. How much she has found out God knows, but find it all out she must, some day; then I pity her!"

The captain, who had been puffing fiercely at his cheroot, threw it away and stood before the speaker.

"And I am to work with that man?"

"Yes," said the other, sitting in the middle of the hammock and emphasizing his words with his finger. "And remember this for all I have said against him, the smartest and most astute administrator in this or any other province in India, but ruthless beyond anything else. Moral!" he added. "deal with him officially only, socially keep clear of him, and his. Think it over, but come to that conclusion when you've done so, and forget that Harman Norville has got a wife as soon as you can. Good night! see you later on at the club bungalow!" And getting into his trap the speaker spun off down the smooth brick-dust road.

The cautioned man watched the lamps pass away into the darkness. "Right, I believe, in all but one detail," he said to himself. "Opium, more than drink, with that blackguard." Then he thought of the wife, and cursed the husband with all his heart and soul. He no longer troubled himself to disguise his infatuation, and stood deliberately scheming in regard to her. He would see, he determined, how far the misery of the case was exhibited in facts; above all, he would see her, and, snatching down a terai hat, matching the dark-colored suit he was wearing, he sprang out into the night. It was one of those dark, clear-aired nights, without the faintest refraction of light in its dead soft blackness. Risk he never permitted to suggest itself to him in connection with his projects, and he knew the short distance he had to traverse. He avoided the road, crossing some open turf by the cantonments till he reached a line of sago palms, which he knew would bring him to the inclosure of the bungalow he was seeking. When he reached it he jumped the fence and passed between the tall, flowering shrubs over the lawn, until he was close to the veranda.

One of the rooms was brightly lit, and under the heavy punkah, as it swung to and fro, he could see Harman Norville lying at full length in a lounge chair, his chin on his chest, in the motionless pose of an unconscious man. Dazzled by the light, his eyes scanned the gloom of the veranda, at first in vain, but presently to notice a figure in a white dress crouching at the point furthest removed from the open door of the room.

He crept silently in the shadow toward her, and where he was he could hear the sound of her stifled sobbing, as she sat with her hands covering her face. He came closer yet, until he was at her side, and so stood for a few moments. Then she lifted her eyes, and through the gloom that enveloped them both looked into his. The first shock of her surprise died away, and still she uttered no word, only rising from her seat and looking fixedly at him, till at last he held out his arms to her, and then, with a little choking sob she let him fold them round her. Of a sudden the broad beam of light that issued from the door of the room where her husband lay was darkened, and she turned hastily as she noticed the change to the window beside it, and looked in, while her companion followed her and glared over her shoulder.

The commissioner had not moved from his position, and still lay to all appearance in a state of coma, but standing by the lamp, which she had just lowered, and looking down on him with a smile of quiet triumph, was a native girl loaded with the jewels and silken shawls that her breed delight in.

The captain's anger nearly suffocated him, as he drew the indignant woman at his side away from the sight, but he said nothing, until they were outside in the darkness again; even then his voice was shaking.

"Bear it, my darling, if you can, until I can outscheme the scoundrel, but if it gets past bearing send to me. While I am in the station you can always reach me; if I go away I will leave my best horse, and a good man, who will ride after me at a word from you. Be brave, my own, and patient, but free you shall be if I bring it about with my own hand."

He was loath, indeed, to leave her, but at last he went back as he had come.

The following morning his friend was driving along the front road of the station, when he encountered the youngest of the commissioner's assistants similarly engaged, and drew up abreast.

"Heard about Strachan?" queried the younger man.

"No! What's he up to?"

"Gone back to the hills as hard as he can go, with most of his ponies! Spoil the polo, begod!"

"What's happened, then?"

"Why, the Dufflas has been kicking up a shine over something or other, and you know what he is in such matters. I met him about an hour ago, and pretty wild he looked—riding as if he got a fresh dak every mile. I'm sorry for the beggars when he tackles 'em! The kubba (news) only came in at midnight to Norville, and he put the matter into Strachan's hands at daybreak."

"Dufflas though," said the other man slowly. "His escort are nearly all Dufflas."

"Yes, but I think they'll stand by him. Maybe there won't be trouble—his influence is pretty thick up there, you know. So long!" and off he went

FOR SALE.

The Rosebank Farm

Containing 180 Acres of Land.

THE above Farm has 120 acres clear and in a good state of cultivation, the remainder covered with wood. It is situate opposite the City of Charlottetown on the Southport side of the Hillsborough River, convenient to Schools, etc.; one mile from Southport Ferry in Summer, and one mile from the city in the winter by the ice.

On the Farm is a good two story Dwelling House and a fine first-class barn and and other outside buildings. It is all fenced with cedar posts and barb wire, with several cross fences of the same material.

The shore front extends for the distance of one mile, giving an abundance of sea manure, also a mussel bed within half mile of the shore.

It would make an excellent Dairy Farm or would make a fine site for a summer hotel, having superior bathing facilities and a perfect view of the city. The general surrounding are very picturesque, making it one of the most desirable health resorts in the Maritime Provinces.

Any purchaser wishing to buy the Stock and Farming Implements in conjunction with the Farm can do so if required. All questions asked will be promptly answered by the undersigned.

Half of the purchase money can remain on mortgage at 5 per cent.

She had read the sign, "Do not speak to the motorman," and she said: "I wonder why not." Then in winsome voice she inquired of that functionary, "Why musn't one talk to the motorman?" He told her it was against the rules. "But why is it against the rules?" "Because it is." "Then you don't like to be talked to?" "Oh, yes; but—thunder! I came within an ace of running down that old gent." "But I should think it would be nice to have somebody to speak to, instead of talking to nobody all day long." "Lady, you are going to stop talking, or there's going to be a smash-up on this line, and a big one—see?" "The hateful thing! And I did so want to be sociable like.
