

ELLEN'S DIARY

Holiday Time Dwindles With Waning Summer

"This would be a lovely afternoon at the shore, wouldn't it?" the one girl of the house across the lane said today, voice-wistful. "Can't you just hear the waves wash?"

"And see the shiny hair bars bare?" we nodded. "But we grinned, 'men must work and girls must too!'" she added, "and isn't it sad there is only one summer in the year?"

And the summer with its holidays, which for so many students nowadays, means only a change of work, is doing out, we fancy, faster now from the ebbside of its store of days.

"There's no last at all to this summer!" one commented recently. "I haven't accomplished nearly so much as I had planned. I guess," she sighed, "no one ever does! There always remains some unfinished business!" she said.

"Let's hope it's only put by for another summer," we said. "Visitors, this evening brought to Alderlea."

"I'd say," Peter offered in a smiling aside to us in the dimming twilight, "we can call ourselves 'baby-sitters' now!"

Jamie and Elva from the farm in the road had just given their three to our care for the evening, which also found Peter, its youngest, sole keeper of the house across the lane. Nice little folks the three great-grand-are, and with that inherent way of children, which soon finds, each one his or her own place in their elders' affections.

There was a silence as the machine went down the lane.

Expressions were sober. But only for the moment.

"Let's get this thing straight!" Peter reminded the trio, "there is to be no crying when you dad and mummy are away!"

Faint smiles glimmered. "Let us play!" Gordie said.

"They can pretty well entertain themselves. Gordie and Peter went to machines and the other boyish interests, and girls, Wendy and Cathie, to those of their own."

When the deepened dusk brought them indoors, Peter explained to the girls on either side of him on the couch, the story a coloring book told, while Gordie continued to play with machines on the table.

Two by two they went to bed, the men — children with James to the house across the lane, we to keep the two maids.

"Whatever shall we do, Ellen, if they chance to waken from sleep, and miss their parents?" James turned back to whisper.

The evening spent away. And at length Scampie barked in the silence and a machine came to the yard. And the girls, evidently having heard it through the mist of sleep, recognizing the sound, came to the floor as one. And all smiles came to meet the pair they most love at the head of the stairway. Gordie presently joined them for the homing.

"They are good children, Ellen," James says now, winding the old clock on its shelf. "Peter is too," he adds. "But then, of course," he smiles fondly, "Peter's a man!"

And our day? It has given us nice memories to keep.

Until tomorrow — Diary— Goodnight.

Drive-In Clinic Cuts Danger Of Contagion

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — For mothers who worry about their children catching something in the pediatrician's waiting room, three Atlanta doctors have a unique solution.

"It's a motel-like, drive-in clinic, with built-in privacy—and it keeps patients isolated from each other."

All mom has to do is drive in with her child, park in front of a vacant diagnosis room and enter. Inside, she locks the door, and flicks a switch to notify the doctor of her arrival.

"We've found this cuts the problem of cross-infection in waiting rooms," said Dr. Robert Garner, one of three pediatricians who built the clinic.

"In our old offices, we saw cases at least once a week of a well child's catching measles or mumps from another child in the waiting room," Garner said in an interview.

"This has been cut drastically," said Dr. Olin Shivers, another of the pediatricians. "In fact, I don't remember a case that's been caught in our new building."

All rooms are connected with an intercom system.

ture suggest roasting the corn the old-fashioned way, over an open fire.

In method one, you husk the cobs and cook them in boiling water until they are as tender as you like them. Then butter, fix on long sticks and roast over the fire.

Method two is more authentic, producing lightly browned ears with a slight caramel flavor.

Pop back the husks and strip the silk. Replace the husks and tie the ends with string. Line the ears up on a grill over hot coals. Turn the corn frequently, until the husks are dry and browned, about 15 to 20 minutes.

To jazz up the plain corn flavor, the dietitians suggest using seasoned butter, made by adding small amounts of garlic, lemon juice, curry, chives or other herbs to creamed butter.
