ELLEN'S DIARY

by an Island Farmer's Wife

How many it is, and a bit dreary - this night, which takes now another week of days away! And dark, beyond the panes washed at times with the silver of showers. The day too was showery; and the flood-gates of the dusk were opened early.

"I don't see why it had to rain today," Gage grumbled this morning. "Must it be damp all fall!" "Yesterday was sunny, don't you remember? The men were out Home ... in the field, topping jumps. They have a nice lot ready now to die," we offered. "That's why I wanted it fine," he nodded. "I was going to help them there today."

But if today suspended such field-work, it provided Rob with an opportunity, and good help to run the cement to make a floor in the moved-barn of last summer, so to make winter quarters available for those of the cattle-kind to be lodged there, when the first wintry storm herds them in from the fields.

Does that storm king wait now just back of a hilltop? It may be. In any event we have entered the season of "melancholy" days, it would seem ... when last leaves fall, softly, so as not to disturb the seasonal hush spread now over the quiet farmlands; when little winds fret low along the lonely fields or mourn thinly high in the treelands. And the cows that have ranged far all day along stubble and sod come earlier to the barnyard gate, waiting to be admitted to the comfort of the stable.

These then are such days, touched with a strange loneliness, though mostly beautiful, in the gray of shadows or the amber bright of the sunlight. And always pleasant indoors - when the hour gathers in the household to meals or into the warmth and light of evening, once day's work is done.

"Damp weather, indeed!" Pat who dropped by this evening chuckled, and there's nothing we can do about it, but wait in patience for the clearing.

"It will come," James said, "this won't last forever! It too will pass." As does the darkest night - and hours that are fearful and desolate.

"There is no night but God can lift it from you; No darkness ever creeps about the heart. But He dispels it, if you call upon Him. No curtain dims, but He can tear apart.

There is no fear, no terror of the darkness. The yet-unknown, the dread yet-to-be, But God can make as nothing - if we trust Him. No peace so great, as His for you and me!"

Until Monday ... Good-night ...

Eat Vegetables In Season

UNDoubtedly there is a purpose for everything that nature does. Way back, when the earth was created, nature apparently decided that some vegetables and fruits would be green, some would be yellow and others would be of assorted colors.

Nature also elected to have some fruits and vegetables grow above the ground and others below. Of course, we all know that they contain large amounts of vitamins and minerals.

We also know why nature arranged to have some fruits and vegetables grow in one season and others in other seasons all the year round. This was well before the days of refrigerators and freezers and nature wanted a readily available supply to keep the earth's population alive.

It would be impossible to list here the various seasons for all the fruits and vegetables you are going to eat or, at least, should eat within the next year.

Suffice it to say that you will get a well balanced diet if you just "eat the colors." Fruits and vegetables are at their best when they look their best.

"White Elephants" Can Be Salvaged

BY ELEANOR ROSE

ONE of the most rewarding shows we have seen in many a season was one built around rehabilitated "white elephants," attic treasures, made over by do-it-yourself enthusiasts.

There were old-fashioned beds brought up-to-date by substituting the footboard for the old-fashioned high headboard, and either upholstering it in leather-like plastic, or slipcovering it in gay fabric to match the bedspread. Or it might be painted and treated to stencil motifs.

Creating Glasses of Fashion

Their mirrors, too take place in the contemporary scene when treated to fine frames salvaged from old pictures and repainted or refinished.

Perhaps the table-top sewing machine, while still doing a good sewing job, looks out of place. One ingenious housewife has come up with a good solution.

Fixing up an extra room, she decided to make good use of the table-top machine. She had the legs sawed off two inches, made a refolded dressing table skirt to fit and had a piece of plate glass cut to fit the top. And there it was, a nice, neat looking piece of furniture.

LET'S EAT

Kidneys For Gourmets

BY IDA BAILEY ALLEN

"LAMB kidneys are a real gourmet dish," observed the Chef. "I actually believe Americans would appreciate them more if they were not so economical! Around 10 cents apiece is all they cost."

"There is no reason to snub so good a meat. Lamb kidneys can be used in dozens of ways, par excellence, of course, Chef, inexperienced cooks do not realize that however they are to be served, kidneys must have the same basic preparation."

To Prepare Kidneys for Cooking: Remove all fat. Wash the kidneys; remove the tubes, gristle and all white centers, or "eyes," as they are called.

Soak the kidneys 30 min. in cold water to cover, containing 1 tsp. salt and 1 tbs. vinegar for 1 qt. This improves the flavor and texture, but does not cause loss of nutrients.

Drain; rinse under running cold water and cook in any way desired.

Lamb Kidney Kebabs (Specialty of the Chef). Order 12 lamb kidneys (2 for each serving). Prepare for cooking as described above. Split the kidneys in halves. Brush all over with hot-soot French dressing; let stand 30 min.

Then string on long skewers, alternating a kidney half with a slice of peeled onion, a good-sized chunk of fresh tomato and one of green pepper. Dust with salt and pepper. Suspend the skewers over the edge of a pan, and broil 3-in. from the heat, 15-20 min. Turn once; while broiling, baste with 1/4 c. melted butter or margarine, containing 1/2 tbs. lemon juice.
