NEWS OF THE WAR.

THE RUSSIAN DEFEAT AT EUPATORIA.

(From the Daily News Correspondent.)

About half-an hour before dawn this morning I was aroused from a sound and comfortable sleep by the clanging of arms, the heavy tread of marching men, going at double quick-time, words incessantly yelled, rather than shouted; and on listening more attentively, the dull, heavy roar of the cannon fall on the ear. Upon going out, I found the streets crowded with troops, all hurrying to the point of attack,—silence tearing at a mad gallop over the frozen mud, and the steamer in the harbour getting up their steam with all possible haste.

When I reached the entrenchment, a furious manœuvre was going on to the right, at an outwork thrown forward a short distance on the plain, and almost surrounded by diminutive windmills; for four or five minutes nothing could be heard but the rapid and tumultuous jerking of the Russian artillery, and then the heavy pieces broke in with a roar which drowned all other sounds. The ground surrounding Eupatoria is a vast sandy plain, broken now and then by hillocks, and close to the entrenchments, by the remains of old Turkish fortifications. To the extreme right there is a large salt lake, which completely protects on that side, and on the left, an eminence of no great elevation runs away in a westerly direction till long in the distance. Upon the summit of this were two large masses of Russian cavalry, banners and dragons, drawn up in squares, and farther on to the right were long columns of infantry, some deployed on the slope; but larger numbers still, I suspect, were behind the hill, the glittering of their bayonets, when the sun rose, being distinctly visible. In front of these, in a long line, were at least seventy guns, about a third of which were pointing a barrel of the new Turkish or Russian guns, and the adjacent portions of the entrenchment in the rear, the fire being vigorously returned, not only from the left and centre of the Turkish lines, but from some picturesque but the flash and smoke of the guns before and behind us, which completely hid the clouds, and revealed clearly the enormous masses of Russian and infantry that covered the eminence and lined the slope. Confused—and there were many who partook of my fears—that I could not contentedly gaze at the scene, I turned my eyes to the rear, above all when I remembered, that the only means of retreat open, in case of reverse, was the Black Sea, which rendered it almost impossible for our men to consider a retreat as a desirable alternative. The cannonade lasted in this way, without any striking result on either side till nearly eight o'clock, when the Russians brought down another battery of 8 pieces at full gallop, and taking up a position within 800 yards of the outwork, (the position of which, though the works were still unfinished, had defended itself with unshaken courage,) opened a furious enfilading fire. To draw the Russian attention to this position, occupied by the regiment of Colonel Ogilby—opened its fire, from one gun, and drew on it instantly a succession of shells, which, however, did not do much harm. Happily, though in one or two instances, they got the range very fairly, and knocked off the top of the field fortification, and, in one instance, the shot went very high, and, after whizzing over some tents, fell in amongst some cavalry on the other side of the centre of the position. This was the range very fairly, and knocked off the top of the field fortification, and, in one instance, the shot went very high, and, after whizzing over some tents, fell in amongst some cavalry on the other side of the centre of the position.

None of the shells, however, attracted much attention from the Valorous steamer, or the harbour, which threw shells with great precision across the mounds of sand on the shore, and amongst the ranks of the Russian artillery, and upon shifting their position several times, till they got fairly out of range. Throughout, the Turkish artillery kept up a steady fire, and, in one instance, we could see the enemy's horses reeling over, or flaming off riderless across the field. Their artillery must certainly practice from the Valorous steamer, by the number of dead horses, and fragments of gun-carriages found afterwards. About ten o'clock, a few moments before the Russian attack was pushed forward to the assault on the extreme right, where they had less to fear from the fire of the artillery, through a large graveyard. What induced them to choose such a spot as this for the attack, it is hard to imagine, as the inequalities of the ground must have thrown them more or less into disorder from the first moment. A few minutes previously, the Russian had sent a rocket-battery ashore, who landed on the extreme right of the town, and coming round amongst the windmills, opened their fire on the entrenchment. The column pushed on to a distance of about twenty yards from the ditch, but there gave way and fell into disorder. Selim Pacha now made a sortie with a brigade of Egyptians, and charged them with the bayonet; but in the act of leading his men on, received a musket-ball through his chest, and fell dead. Small fire was also wounded on the same occasion. The Russians now fell into disorder, gave way, and retired, leaving the town, and fell dead. Small fire was also wounded on the same occasion.
