CHAPTER XIV.—CONTINUED.

Rough as I was, I had studied psychology sufficiently to understand these truths; and I endeavored to analyze my passion for this girl or woman—to discover why I loved her.

Mystery of our nature! I loved her not the less! And yet my passion was pure, and I do not believe that my heart was wicked.

I loved without reason; but I loved now without hope. Hope I had before that night.

I could rest upon my couch no longer. I rose and sought the open air; I climbed to the azotea, and paced it to and fro.

From its very darkness I might have known that light was near, for the proverb is equally true in the moral as in the material world. Light was near.

CHAPTER XV.

AN ODD EPISTLE.

BREAKFAST I hardly tasted. A tazo of chocolate and a small sugared cake—the desayuno of every Mexican—were brought, and these served me for breakfast.

About noon, the sergeant of the guard reported that a Mexican wished to speak with me; mechanically, I gave orders for the man to be sent up; but it was not until he appeared before that I thought of what I was doing.

The presence of the Mexican at once roused me from my reverie. I recognized him as one of the vaqueros of Don Ramon de Vergas—the same I had seen on the plain during my first interview with Isolina.

There was something in his manner that betokened him a messenger. A faded note, which he drew from under his jerkin—after having glanced around to see if he was noticed—confirmed my observation.

TO BE CONTINUED.

TEMPERANCE is reason's girl and passion's bride; the strength of the soul and the foundation of virtue.—Jeremy Taylor.
