Selected Poetry.

The following poem, from the Commercial Bal-lin, reminds one of the sparkling wit and brilliancy of some of Thomas Hood's best pieces. The writer is a native of this Island at present in Boston. We have fair prospects that our young friend will reach a high niche in the temple of literature.
—ED. EXAMINER.

DISENCHANTED.

We met in the ball room's dazzling light,
Where she shone the peerless queen,
And I loved her, as never woman was loved
On this earthly sphere I ween.

Her voice was low and soft and sweet,
As the zephyr's trembling sigh,
And the dazzling jewel new sister won From the light of her sparkling eye.

Fairest of all the radiant throng,
With Love's mysterious art,
Th' admiring gaze and the rival's sneer Spoke the homage of each heart.

But lovelier far, in the secret shade,
"Nearer the spreading greenwood tree,
Was my angel's smile as she pledged the boon
Of her priceless love to me.

And drunk with joy and trembling yet,
On bliss so great to mortal man,
I joyed, yet feared, the while.

For I doubted the truth of my senses frail,
With a lover's self-dishain,
And besought my idol love to speak
The blissful words again.

But she coyly buried her golden locks
On my bosom, nor spoke a word;
"Nay! write it, love," I whispered low,
And the maid complying heard.

A sleepless couch was mine that night,
And I sat at early morn
At my window seat, and heard the clang
Of the breakfast gong with scorn.

The weary hours dragged on, and on,
As I watched the lagging clock, Ere, at full high noon, I heard the sound Of the lazy postman's knock.

The note was dainty, perfumed and tinged
In fashion's latest style,
With a monogram rich, and noble care,
For her sire was Lord of the Oil.

I break the seal with trembling hand
And eager anxious gaze;
When ah, fatal hour! What see I there,
In horror and amaze!

Is this deception false? Can human heart Such base deception hold?
Alas! alas! she is not false,
Nor her faithful bosom cold!

She calls me "dear," and gives her heart—O, double E. K. "dear!"
Hear "heart" and says that life Without me would be "dear."

She will cling to me like a frail young vine
To sturdy oak-like oak!
And like Mrs. Micawber, will no er "dear!"
Me "since her love is speak."

She vows "no rival will cut me out—How I hate that vulgar phrase!"
And talks in a sort of time novel strain,
Of the thoughts "her bosom sways."

Her soul is the "temple of cupid's shrine," Which swallows of Bunline's pen;
And Sylvanus Cobb, I plainly trace
In her dread of "fickle men."

She knows the "language of flowers," it seems,
The "not in the corn trade,
And quotes some lines of poetic fire—
By a "Letter Writer" made.

Oh that she had loved me less, or told Her love in language clearer,
Or that Mrs Southworth were stranger to her And Noah Webster dearer!

"Spell" bound I gaze; Behold azar like My written down I see,
For I'm bound to her, who "until death"
Has "pledged her heart" to me.

Miscellany.

"OUR INDEBTEDNESS TO IRELAND."

The Waltham Sentinel of Oct. 13, has the following account of a lecture delivered by a Protestant clergyman on an Irish organization in Waltham, Mass.

The lecture season was inaugurated Wednesday evening at Rutherford Hall, by Rev. Elias Nason, who came to fill his engagement with the Shearers Associates, an association composed of a number of our intelligent and energetic young Irish-American citizens, and one that bids fair to become permanent and soon rank equal with the best in our town. Mr.
Nason ascended the platform shortly after 8 o'clock, and was introduced to the audience by Mr. J. Hendrahen, the president of the associates. His theme was "Our Indebtedness to Ireland—in a historical, literary, and military point of view." Commencing with the geography of Ireland, her scenery, so beautiful, her many natural advantages for a country with a territory so limited, her superiority over other countries for the pursuit of various industries—a description of which was rendered in most eloquent language—the lecturer stated her many grievances existing for so long a period, and then proceeded to the principal point of the lecture, viz: our indebtedness to Ireland. This he summed up by an enumeration of the leading events in the world's history in which Irishmen were prominent characters, including many in the history of our own country and of Massachusetts, through the veins of the majority of whose people, including the men whose prominence have made their names familiar in all our households, flow the Celtic blood. And this element, stated the lecturer, we were never in greater need of than at the present time, as statistics show a "great falling off" among the old native Saxon population, and as the emigrant, particularly the Irish, from some cause known only to the Creator above, comes to our shores hale and healthy, well developed, and in the full possession of health and strength, he is looked upon as the augmenting force required; he makes this land his home, invariably continues to possess those physical attainments, identifies himself with the country's interests, and brings forth a large family of sons and daughters, who become useful men and women, sending more than their proportion of distinguished men into every branch of the world's service.

"Strike out from English literature what Irishmen have contributed," said the lecturer, "and you miss her brightest gems." From her history and the history of the United States, political, military and naval, exclude the deeds performed by Irishmen, and no longer can those nations boast of their now proudest acts. The names of the most competent in the history of England and America were mentioned; among the former, Oliver Goldsmith, Jonathan Swift, Henry Grattan, Edmund Burke, Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Daniel O'Connell, the Duke of Wellington, etc., and among the latter, Gen. Montgomery, Gen. Stark, Commodore Barry, Thomas Carroll, a signer of the Declaration of Independence; the Sullivan brothers, one of whom was for two terms Governor of Massachusetts; the dashing Gen. Phil. Sheridan, who gave the rebel Early his fill; Gen. Thos. Francis Meagher, who led the famous Irish Brigades in the late war; Thos. Addis Emmet, James T.
Brady and Chas. O'Connor, the eminent barri-sters, and a host of others. Of Commodore Barry an anecdote was related. A British war vessel was passing Barry's ship one day, and the commander, desirous of ascertaining the name and character of the vessel, hailed it in the customary way, and received the following reply from the Commodore himself:
"The frigate United States, commanded by saucey Jack Barry,—half Irish, half Yankee!
Who are you?" "What a pity!"
