BRISTOL

Friends of Mr. Phillip Malone will be pleased to learn he has returned to his residence in the eastern section of the Island after being a patient in the Charlottetown Hospital for some time. Mr. Malone is a brother of Ep. Malone here.

Mr. and Mrs. James Arnold were visitors to the city last week for a few days with members of their family who reside there.

Mr and Mrs. Kenneth Squires were in the city last week on business. They returned from Ontario recently and plan to remain here.

Friends of Mr. Charles Eldershaw will be sorry to learn of his poor health. One of our outstanding fishermen here for thirty years, Mr. Eldershaw has not been in prime health for some time and has entered the Provincial Sanatorium to undergo treatment.

Miss Josephine Sinnott was in the city on Wednesday. Despite the fact it is several months since she was severely hurt in an accident while going home from work, she is only getting around on crutches yet and will not be back to work before spring at the earliest.

Farmers here say ploughing in January is a waste of time and ruinous to the land. The ground is far too wet.

Scores of friends here young and old regret to learn of the passing of Mr. Patrick Mullins in the Charlottetown Hospital after several weeks of illness. Mr. Mullins endeared himself to residents here during his years of government service on the machines and snow ploughs. Every one knew when he saw the plough come through it was Paddy Mullins and everyone was sorry when poor health forced him to take up lighter work in the city. To his wife and family the sincere sympathy of his scores of friends here is being extended at this time.

Mr. Ralph McEwen was a business visitor to the city on Tuesday. Mr. McEwen, has returned to the old homestead in the harbour district after several years in Hamilton, Ontario. Life is coming back to this fine old property that has been idle for years.

Mr. Vincent Coffin was in the city on Tuesday on business. Mr. Coffin who is employed on one of the government dredges is home now while his ship is laid up for winter months.

CARE AT CALVING TIME

Before discussing the factors concerning the new born calf, mention should be made about its care before birth. This is done, of course, by caring for the cow.

The expectant mother should have exercise each day the weather permits. When turning her out in a yard, make sure there are no slippery ice patches, and no narrow doorways by which she might be injured. Do not allow dogs to chase her.

Her normal feed may be continued up to the time of calving, if her manure indicates that the feed has the desired laxative qualities, and if her udder is not unduly congested and inflamed. The feed can be made more laxative, if necessary, by increasing the amount of bulkiness, and by using more bran or linseed oilmeal. More silage and roots could be fed. To lessen the udder congestion cut down on the amount of concentrates, and bathe the udder with a suitable mixture such as a mixture of one-half cod liver oil, and one-half ethyl alcohol. Some herdsmen relieve the pressure in the udder by milking the cow once or twice before calving. In this practice, though frowned on, if done, the milk should be saved and kept frozen or in refrigeration, and should be fed to the calf when it is born.

About ten days before calving, the cow should be kept in a maternity pen. This pen should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected after each usage. After scraping out all manure and litter, disinfect using Cresol 4 oz. to one gallon water, and then bed it well with clean straw.

The pen should be well-lighted, but free from drafts and dampness.

CALVING

If possible, an attendant should be present, as the cow is calving. If unforseen complications occur, it is well to get a qualified veterinarian at once. Many cows have been permanently damaged by "quacks"

The calf's two front feet and head should appear first. If the afterbirth is not expelled naturally within 36 hours, the services of a veterinarian should be procured.

As the calf arrives, make sure no mucus of membrance covers the nostrils of the calf. If the calf is not breathing, attempt to start it by slapping its chest vigorously or by alternately compressing and relaxing it. The cow may be assisted in drying her calf by wiping it with a cloth or clean straw. The naval should be disinfected with tincture of iodine soon after birth.

Before the calf suckles, the udder of the cow should be cleansed by washing it with warm water and a mild disinfectant. If the calf is weak, assist it in getting its first meal. The first milk of the cow is called colostrum, and should always be given to the calf. It is high in vitamin A, and antibodies which greatly aid in the protection of the calf against disease and infection. If, for any reason, the calf cannot get the colostrum, the whites of six eggs should be mixed with milk for the first feed. For each succeeding feed, one egg less may be used.

AFTER CALVING

Shortly after calving, the cow should have a drink of warmed water. If the meal ration has been reduced prior to calving, the cow may gradually be brought back to full feed over a period of several days. However, if the cow has had acetonemia or if it has been common in the herd, no reduction of the meal ration should be carried out. If milk fever occurs, which is denoted by paralytic symptoms in the cow and also by the cow turning her head back to her side, call a veterinarian.

The calf should be separated from the cow in about twenty-four hours from the time of birth, and put in a small calf pen. This pen should be thoroughly clean and have solid walls. If the calf is not separated from its mother by this time, it may get too much to eat and become scoured; it will also be much more difficult to teach to drink a bucket.

The first three or four days, the calf should get the colostrum. From the fourth day to two or three weeks, new milk from the same cow should be given. The amount is usually determined by the size of the calf. About one-tenth of the calf's weight is a good rule of thumb, and so probably eight to twelve pounds will be the amount. Remove the froth and check the amount on your dairy scales. Always feed the calf in a clean pail, and have the milk warm and fresh. Feed the calf the same time each day. Good clean legume hay should be before the calf when it is a week old, and change the hay before it gets soiled.

GIVE SKIM MILK

From the second to the fourth weeks, skim milk may be given, and the calf started on meal, either calf meal or whole oats. Salt should be available for the calf, and it should be taught to drink water. Always change feed gradually, for example - when the feed is being changed from whole milk to skim milk.

If the calf becomes scoured in spite of all practice outlined above, it is possible that it may be an infectious bacterial disease. Isolate the calf and take every precaution to prevent the spread of the disease. A veterinarian should be called before the calf's resistance has been too greatly lowered. There are several modern drugs which may be used, and in most cases, if given in time, will ensure complete recovery.

CUD FOR CALVES

Taking the cud from a cow and placing it in the mouth of the calf may appear to be a strange practice, but there is evidence that this procedure may be of value in certain circumstances.

The bacteria necessary for the calves to digest hay and other dry feeds are not present at birth and when the calves are separated from the mother shortly thereafter, the youngsters have little chance of obtaining this substance needed for early rumination.

The cud then may be given the calf when it is about ten days old. It may be placed in the mouth or given as a drench mixed with warm water. The results have proven interesting. The calf is able to eat dry feed earlier, does not scour easily, develops more length and glossier coat, and does not have a pot-bellied appearance. The process of getting the cud is simple-choose a gentle cow, open her mouth and reach in for the cud.

This procedure is also of value in cows that have gone off feed. In some of these cases, it will greatly assist in the return of a normal appetite.
