West started with the ace of diamonds, East signaling with the nine. West stewed a while and then led the ace of clubs. Again East signaled with the nine.

West now had to decide whether it was better to continue with a diamond or a club. He finally determined on the diamond.

It was now East's turn to cogitate. He gave the matter considerable thought. (The declarer was already down 500.) West had returned the seven of diamonds, obviously his highest diamond, and declarer was therefore marked to have at least one more diamond.

But East was still not sure. He had a strong urge to try to cash a club trick first. Still in a fog, he turned to North and said: "Please. What system are you two playing?"

But West, his partner, interrupted and said: "Why do you ask? Don't tell me that you want to learn this system." Down 1,100.

Court Bans Stories Telling Of Life At Windsor Castle

By JOHN DUDMAN

LONDON (Reuters) — The Queen's castle is her home and she is entitled to the same privacy as all other Britons, the London High Court decided Tuesday.

An order was made banning William Ellis, 51-year-old tavern keeper and former superintendent of Windsor Castle, from writing again about his experiences during nine years of royal service.

Ellis was not in court but promised through his lawyer not to write about his job in the castle or pass on any information to newspapers about the Queen or Royal Family.

INSIDE STORY

The case arose following publication Jan. 11 in the London Sunday Pictorial of an article entitled "The Queen in Her Castle," billed as the first of a series.

It was carried under the name of "William Ellis, the man who ran Her Majesty's weekend home."

Ellis resigned his post at Windsor Castle, ancient fortress 20 miles from London, where the Royal Family spends many weekends, in November, 1957, "for personal reasons."

An interim injunction restraining Ellis from writing of his experiences was granted last week, and Attorney-General Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller asked Tuesday for a continuation.

BROKE UNDERTAKING

Manningham-Buller said Ellis' newspaper article was a "clear breach" of an undertaking Ellis gave when he left royal service to the effect he would not disclose anything about the Royal Family.

"In my submission, it is clear that he broke his word and that if he was paid he broke it for money."

The rival lawyers agreed that Ellis' promise not to break the undertaking again was sufficient to have the case stayed. The judge ruled accordingly and decided Ellis would have to pay costs.

Manningham-Buller said he was not suggesting the newspaper was aware of the undertaking Ellis had given but added that a "few inquiries in the right place would have led to their learning that he had done so."

Find Four Men Stranded On Ice In Hudson Bay

WINNIPEG (CP)—Four men, stranded with their damaged commercial plane on ice in the mouth of Hudson Bay, were spotted late Tuesday by an RCAF search plane.

An RCAF spokesman said the plane was located near Southampton Island, 500 miles north of Churchill, Man., and 1,100 miles north of Winnipeg. They had been missing since Sunday.

Pilot of the downed plane, owned by TransAir Limited of Winnipeg, was identified as Sam Bondareff of Churchill. The others aboard had not been identified Tuesday night.
