THE SECOND CABIN PASSENGER.

By Edward Marshall.

The loss of the jewels drove Morley almost mad. Had they not been missing from the pocket in which he had so carefully placed them, he might have hoped that they had slipped out of themselves and had fallen into the hands of the extraordinary proceedings. In a few words the captain explained that one among the crowd had suffered a very serious loss, and that he was anxious to recover it. He asked the passengers to submit to having their cabins searched while they remained in the dining saloon, and announced that no one would be permitted to go below or out upon the deck while the search was in progress. The work he said had been given into the hands of six squads of two men and one woman each.

Under the command of one of his most trusted officers. Further than this he asked the men to pass their arms through the purser's office, and to be searched by the pursers and second officer, while the women passing through one of the purser's offices. The search was conducted in a most thorough manner. After they had been searched passengers were requested to pass to the after saloon and the smoking room. He added that these searches were harsh measures and would be so in truth were not all passengers treated alike.

During these preliminaries, Morley kept close to Madeline. He was, if not reminded, meant to run to her, but he assumed such serious proportions in his mind by this time that he could not avoid speculation about Madeline's opportunity, and, although his love had not actually waned, he began to tremble for fear that it would have reason to be. He watched her face as the captain talked and he saw it flush. That frightened him. When, in a moment later, she turned away from him, as he thought, to attend to an agitation which she did not wish him to see, he was dumfounded. After the captain had described the lost package, however, she glanced quickly at him with a horror-stricken expression, which he thought, could not be counterfeit, and whispered: "Why, he means your necklace!"

"No," she interrupted, "I will do it." Again, could he remember how many eyes were turned against him on that crowded promenade. He comforted himself with the thought that an expert pocket-pick might have performed the deed while they were mulling in a dining room, or wondered if he had not gone to sleep in a deck chair on one of the nights when he remained late out of doors and thus had allowed himself to be robbed. It was plausible than all the other theories was that which involved the second cabin passenger. Here was a man whose villainous character had been marked upon his face. Almost from the beginning of the voyage circumstances had marked him for Morley's intense dislike and had shown them so together that he had no doubt as to his guilt. The episode at the second cabin rail could not have been an accident. What more probable than that he had intended to rob Morley, and which resulted successfully?

But how had the man learned that he had diamonds to be robbed of? Constantly his mind asked this question and constantly answered his brain answered: "You have revealed that fact to only one person on this ship—Madeline Perrine." It is not fair to say that Morley for an instant voluntarily or involuntarily, he thought of the woman whom he had that day, declared his love, had robbed him. The idea was a part of the logical sequence of his reasoning, but it was not the one that he had in mind when he pressed her to his breast for a first lover's kiss, and afterwards as she shyly tucked the photograph away, he had no other knowledge than that she was what she and her friends asserted that she was. Was it not possible that she was a clever, unscrupulous woman, traveling under false pretenses for dishonest purposes? But his infatuation was too intense to permit him to let his mind dwell on the impossible possibility that she was an adventuress and had deceived him. He soon saw that he could do little toward the solution of the terrible puzzle. He went to the captain, let it be said, and told his story in every detail except that relating to his unenviable suspicions of Madeline and their foundation.

The hale old officer was dumfounded. He looked keenly at Morley first and apparently was satisfied that he was telling the truth. He instantly ordered four men to search the second cabin stateroom and all his belongings, but this ended without bringing what he sought to light. Then called the stewards of all the sections together and instructed them to inform every person in the first and second cabins that the captain wished them to meet in the grand saloon at 11 the next morning.

A well known writer declares that a cruel and "howe fiend" it is truly to have a disease which would be a curse to a man. It is truly a curse to have a disease which would be a curse to a man. It is truly a curse to have a disease which would be a curse to a man. It is truly a curse to have a disease which would be a curse to a man.

Women on an average need a little less than a man much food as a working man. A good deal in a few words. "I paid a Toronto specialist on catarrh a large sum of money but I got no benefit. I tried them all, but finally, almost in despair, and assuredly without any faith, I tried Chase's Catarrh Cure. It is all that it is recommended, which is saying a good deal in a few words." Joel Rogers, clerk, Division Court, Boston. Improved blower in each 25c box.

They were not destined, though, to reach the searchers, for before half a dozen people had gone through the door of the grand saloon, and passing to where the captain stood, near his center, whispered something to the searchers that they might stop their work, and then, rapping on the table to attract the attention of the long lines of waiters, the captain said: "It gives me pleasure to announce that this disagreeable task may be discontinued. The lost diamonds have been found."

PEARLS FOUND IN SCOTIA.

One From Aberdeenshire Said to Form One of the Queen's Jewels. One is so much accustomed to associate pearls with the eastern and gold with the western countries, that it is not surprising that the discovery of pearls in Scotland and gold in Wales seems somewhat opposed to the order of things. That gold exists in Wales is, of course, a well known fact, and the small and unprofitable quantities found have resulted in the abandonment of the mining operations, commenced by Richard Morgan.

But the pearls of Scotia have quite a different history. For centuries pearls have been found in the River Ythan, in Aberdeenshire, and only last year an Aberdeen man made some notable hauls, which he disposed of to jewelers at the northern town. It was recently stated in a London paper that a pearl taken from the river Ythan is believed to form one of the Queen's crown jewels. It is to be hoped that the belief is well founded, for in that case it may be reasonably claimed that the precious stone in question is the only one contributed by the British Islands, a thought calculated to gratify our national pride, for Scotland might be well represented then by a pearl in the national regalia.

A farmer who found a very large and perfect pearl in the shell of a mussel taken from the Ythan. Happening to visit London some time afterward, he displayed his treasure to a West-end jeweler, who, struck with the size and beauty of the gem, asked the price. The farmer demanded what possibly he regarded as a big price, viz. £100. Now, this was in the days when Scotland had her own coinage, and a pound (£) was equivalent to 10s. so that the £100 he asked would only have represented 25s. 6d. English money.

His surprise and delight may be imagined, therefore, when he received for his pearl £100 sterling. It is doubtful, however, whether the English jeweler would have shared these feelings had he known the exact meaning of the word "penny," demanded by the owner of the pearl. However, he had no occasion to complain, for he is said to have sold the gem subsequently at a large profit.—Scottish Advertiser.

May a man who goes to church with a long face tell you with a measure that is too late.
