TAKE WARNING!

Neglect Not These Signals of Danger.

A Useful Lesson on Health Taught by The Indians' Example.

Let the Remedy be Simple and Safe—Kickapoo Indian Sagwa.

If you are ailing, not exactly sick but not feeling "just right," have a drowsy, dull feeling, bad taste in the mouth, variable appetite, occasional pains in the joints and muscles, and other signs of impending sickness, why not do as the Indian does—drive such symptoms out of the system by the judicious use of their reliable vegetable remedy, Kickapoo Indian Sagwa?

"Thundering Horse," a Kickapoo chief, age 92 years. From his photograph.

Don't neglect such warnings.

That pain in your shoulder may develop into rheumatism, and a month's sickness deprive you of the income of your toil.

That white, furry tongue denotes your liver is out of order, and disease would easily take root in your system.

What could you do then!

Think of your business, your income and your family.

Seek safety as you would fly from cholera or small pox.

You are in danger if you neglect these warnings. They may pass off, but the chances are against you, and even then the poison is only latent in your system.

Do not, however, put your trust in the numerous mineral medicines with which the market is flooded. The action of many of these decoctions comes from mineral poisons they contain, such as mercury, arsenic, strychnine, bismuth, iodide of potassium, and the like, and any druggist will tell you if he tells you truly, that this is so.

Kickapoo Indian Sagwa and other Kickapoo Indian medicines contain only the product of the field and forest, nature's own vegetable growth of roots, barks and herbs, and of necessity are free from all mineral poisons whatever, because the Indians have no knowledge of them, depending wholly upon nature's laboratory for their resources, and upon their skill, born of centuries of experience, in preparing them.

Kickapoo Indian Sagwa, made by the Indians from roots, barks and herbs of their own gathering and curing, is obtainable of druggists and medicine dealers only. One dollar per bottle; six bottles for five dollars.

FREE Send three two-cent stamps to pay postage and we will mail you free a thrilling and interesting book of 173 pages, entitled "Life and Scenes Among the Kickapoo Indians." Tells all about the Indians. Address HEALY & BIGELOW, Distributing Agents, 521 Grand Ave New Haven, Conn.

SOME ODD STORIES.

INTERESTING TALES OF ADVENTURE ON SEA AND LAND.

A Mysterious Case and a Wrecked Life. His End Came When He Made the Charge With Custer—The Foolish Habit of Carrying a Revolver.

[Copyright, 1893, by American Press Association.]

"It was a very mysterious case from first to last," so said every one at the time and so thinks every one now who is familiar with the incidents. The moral of the whole story is that a man may be declared innocent by a jury and yet lose caste in the eyes of the world and suffer more cruelly than if he had been subjected to the severest penalty of the law.

LYING DEAD ON THE FLOOR.

Frank Leonard and Harry Dixon were Virginians. They were of the same age, and as their fathers' plantations joined they were thrown together from their earliest recollection, and so grew up to be more like brothers than friends.

Their education was had in the same school, and so their friends were not surprised when it became known that the two young men were about to go to Jefferson college, Pennsylvania, to study medicine together.

Damon and Pythias themselves were not more warmly attached to each other than these youths seemed to be, but love, if not so lasting, is certainly stronger for the time than friendship.

Unfortunately for themselves, Frank Leonard and Harry Dixon both fell in love, and it was with the same fair Quakeress.

When the change came about, they had already been a year at Jefferson college and were to have graduated in six months. Up to this time they roomed together, and there had never been a misunderstanding between them. But unconsciously the beautiful girl broke the friendship and tore their lives apart, and thereafter they had separate rooms and boarding places, and they did not even recognize each other in class.

As with many southern young men at that time and not a few today, the Virginians had the foolish if not cowardly habit of carrying pistols in a peaceful community, where the law was quite able and ready to protect them.

It may be well to know in this connection that just before the young men first started for the medical college Mr. Leonard, Frank's father, bought two Smith & Wesson pistols of exactly the same make and caliber in Richmond and gave one to each of the boys. This served to complicate matters, as we shall see.

One evening, so it was shown in evidence, Harry Dixon, looking very much excited, appeared in Frank Leonard's room.

It was a warm summer or rather spring night, so that the windows and doors were open, and everything said by the young man could be distinctly heard by the boarders on that floor.

It is supposed that Leonard rose when Dixon entered, but be that as it may his salutation was:

"Well, sir, what brings you here?"

"You do," replied Dixon angrily.

"I didn't send for you."

"No, nor would I have come if you had, unless you sent for me through a second, which you haven't the courage to do," hissed Dixon.

"Well, tell me why you've come," said Leonard, his voice trembling at the taunt, but still the cooler of the two.

"I have come to know why you have not kept your word."

"What word?"

"Your promise that if I did not visit Miss White you would not."

"I never made such a promise."

"But I say you did."

"I could not be such a fool as to make such a promise, nor so little of a gentleman as not to accept the lady's invitation if she sent me one."

"Frank Leonard, Miss White never sent you an invitation since you and I got to know each other and parted," said Dixon.

"You must not judge of her treatment of me by her treatment of yourself. Here is a printed invitation to a picnic received today, and as it is a formal matter I violate no confidence or etiquette in showing it to you."

"She didn't send it! You stole it!" This in Dixon's voice was distinctly heard by a number of now very much interested people.

Then, like an echo of the last word, a shot rang out, and a body was heard to fall to the floor.

Fearing to go into the room of the angered Virginian, the police were called by the boarders.

Fully five minutes elapsed between the shot and the arrival of two officers. This is what they found: Harry Dixon lying dead on the floor with a pistol near his right hand, and Frank Leonard standing over him and trying to force water between the set, purple lips.

"He shot himself!" was Leonard's exclamation on seeing the officers.

Neither the officers, nor the coroner's jury, nor the grand jury believed Leonard's story. If they had, he would not have been sent to Moyamensing prison and kept there for five months without bail.

But even five months did not much abate the excitement caused by this shooting. At the trial, which lasted 10 days, with the brokenhearted father of the unfortunate young man in attendance, the courtroom was packed.

The case was entirely circumstantial. The talk already recorded was given in evidence. The two pistols were found, one in a table drawer of Leonard's room and the other on the floor beside the dead man, with one chamber discharged, which the bullet taken from Dixon's brain exactly fitted. But then the same might be said of any bullet from either pistol.

From first to last Leonard maintained that Dixon shot himself, but the prosecution tried to show that from the man's character this was impossible, and they insisted that in the five minutes before the officers came Leonard had changed the pistols.

Public opinion was much divided as to the guilt or innocence of the accused man, and bets were freely offered and taken as to what would be the verdict of the jury.

After deliberating 24 hours, the jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty," and half the people applauded, and the other half were disappointed.

But this was not the end of the tragedy. The young lady in the case, who had been a belle, never again went into society, but died two years afterward of a broken heart, if ever a woman did in the world.

Frank Leonard did not finish his medical course, but went back to Virginia, where his old associates received him coldly.

From Virginia he went west and enlisted in the Seventh cavalry, where he was regarded as the best soldier, but the most silent man in the regiment.

His end came when, with Custer, he charged down on the fortified camps of the Sioux on the Little Big Horn. When the unmutilated body of Frank Leonard was found a few days afterward it, too, had a bullet through the brain.

How He Came Back.

Judge Tom Clarke—why they call him "judge" I do not know, for he is not a lawyer, but a rich old broker well known on Wall street. Why "Tom," is more easily explained, for he is hail fellow well met with every one, the soul of conviviality and one of the best story tellers at his club.

I was his guest a few nights since, and as he delights in the society of younger men he might easily have been the father of any of us.

The talk had been about athletics, in which the younger men, some of them fresh from college, were much interested, and all of whom told some story of his own prowess in some particular field.

Walking, cycling, running and jumping were the chief topics, and when these began to flag the judge, who had been a silent but an intent listener, said:

"Boys, did you ever suspect that in my time I have been a famous walker?"

"No," replied one, "but I can easily believe that before you took on flesh you could get over the ground very fast."

"Well, I could, and I'll give you an illustration. When the war broke out, I was working on my father's farm up in Vermont, and although I'd play second fiddle to some in those days when it came down to pure, unadulterated patriotism, yet I must confess that it was a yearning to get away from the awful monotony of that farm quite as much as a desire to preserve the Union that prompted me to enlist.

"I got a lieutenant's commission in the Third Vermont, and I looked, or thought I looked, so killingly handsome in my full dress uniform that I wore it in and out of season. I would have you understand, gentlemen, that I use the word 'killingly' as applicable to my influence over the ladies and not in connection with my conduct in front of the enemy.

"We were sent over the Long bridge into Virginia, and our tents stretched like a canvas city from Arlington heights to Alexandria, seven miles below. This was after the battle of Bull Run, in which I am happy to say I was not.

"It was easy for an officer to get a leave in those days, and as Washington was full of lovely women at the time I managed to be there oftener than I was in camp.

"Of course I soon fell in love—was never out of love in those days, and I haven't got over the weakness yet. The object of my ardor at this time was a beautiful Pennsylvania girl, the daughter of a famous congressman. I might have been as happy as a man ever can be who is in love were it not for a rival. This rival was a young West Pointer and captain of a troop of cavalry. Because of that girl, I hated him and he hated me far more than either of us did the enemy in gray.

"The captain used to take the lady out for horseback rides in the daytime, and I used to escort her to balls or the theater at night, so that, in her own language, she was 'having a real lovely time.'

"At first the captain and I used to exchange the customary salutations on meeting, but at length this gave way to a stiff bow, till finally we didn't speak or bow at all, but just glared at each other.

"But about my walking. Well, one day a brother officer told me that he had heard the cavalry captain make an insulting remark in connection with my name the day before. I should explain that at this time my regiment had been moved to Fairfax Court House and that the captain's command was in the District of Columbia, 20 miles away. I had no horse, but boiling with indignation and jealousy I determined to find the fellow before the sun went down and if he did not apologize on his knees to thrash him within an inch of his life.

"I got a leave, and off I started on foot. You can imagine how fast I traveled when I tell you that under a broiling sun I walked to the captain's camp in just four hours and a half."

Here the judge stopped as if he had finished his story. As the ending was not satisfactory, I asked:

"But how did you return, judge?"

"How did I return? Oh, yes. Well, I rode back."

"On the captain's horse?"

"No, in an ambulance, and with a doctor holding my pulse and a nurse wetting my bandages."

A Witty Excuse.

Tom Marshall of Kentucky was as witty as he was eloquent, and as ill starred as he was capable. He might have been the first man in the land but for his unfortunate habit of inebriety—a habit that toward the last became his chronic condition.

He had the faculty of making friends and retaining them, and among those who stuck by him to the end was Dr. Tweedy of Jessamine county, quite as distinguished in his own sphere as was Marshall.

Tom was taken down almost a year before his death with rheumatic gout, and Dr. Tweedy was called over from Nicholasville to attend him.

The patient submitted reluctantly to the treatment, which involved entire abstinence from the exciting cause.

After a few weeks Marshall began to mend, and on coming in one morning the doctor was delighted to find that the disease had disappeared and that his patient was in high spirits.

The cause of this hilarity was evident in the glasses and bottles on the table. A friend in Cincinnati had sent Tom as a present a case of the finest mixed liquors.

"Come, doctor!" cried Marshall. "You must try a glass of this cognac. It is the finest and mellowest that ever passed a man's lips."

"Ah, Tom," said the doctor, "this will never do. Have you so soon forgotten that this stuff is the cause of all your suffering?"

"Is it indeed?"

"It is."

"Well, fill up your glass," laughed Tom, "for now that we have found the cause the sooner we get rid of it the better!"

DISABLED THE MAN-OF-WAR.

A Steamer Returns the Fire of an American Warship With Telling Effect.

Late advices from Alaska state that the United States steamship Mohican intercepted the steamer Alexandria, from Honolulu, in the Behring Sea, June 25, while raiding seal rookeries. The Mohican ordered the Alexandria to lay to, but the latter vessel refused to obey and increased her speed. The Mohican fired two blank shots across the Alexandria's bow as a signal to heave to, whereupon the Alexandria turned her six-pounder on the American warship and sent a shell crashing through her sides and into her gun room. The shell played havoc among the ship's machinery and completely disabled the Mohican. The Alexandria continued on her way, while the Mohican had to anchor six hours for repairs.
