Out Our Way

Stranger in My Old Home Town

(Continued from yesterday) Soon the beautiful countryside of New Brunswick rolled out its giant green carpet and the little lost son of Prince Edward Island rushed breathlessly onward. Small towns with big names held my attention as I drove down Main Street, then like the leaves of the lovely maple trees they faded and disappeared as new wonders burst forth to hold my attention. The soil, the color of burnt ashes at the beginning of my journey, grew darker with each passing mile until now it resembled the blood of the hundreds of fallen deer, or should I say baby deer, slaughtered by big strong men whose cars, the license plates of which identified them as "sportsmen" from Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, litter the highway from Portland to Saint John. How proud these "sportsmen" must feel in the long winter evenings as they tell their families and friends about their harrowing experience when they came face to face with the GIANT CANADIAN MOOSE!

Now the narrow strip of pavement began to widen and small settlements gave way to larger settlements until an avenue lined with buildings on both sides reminded me of a valley nestled in the hills. Then a large sign proudly welcomed me to Saint John. The ride up and down the hilly streets was not unlike riding the roller coaster back home at Revere Beach. Out of the city once more and headed for the dairy centre of New Brunswick, Sussex. Once more I almost ran into the strong arms of the law. And, brother! this was top shelf law, none other than a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whose motto, "Always get their man," is world famous, and for one horrible moment, I thought I was the man! As I made my approach to the larger cities I noticed that the other cars would slow down to a snail's pace. Why, if the sign stated that the speed limit for that particular town was twenty-five miles per hour, the cars would slow down to that rate of speed. Not my car! No sir! I couldn't see any signs in slowing down, especially when I didn't see any policeman around to see that the law was enforced. As I arrived at the outskirts of Sussex, the same thing happened. All the cars reduced their speed and prepared to make a slow entry into the city, and I, of course, pulled out of position and began passing the slow-moving traffic. As I passed each car I noticed the driver waving his arms and almost jumping out of his pants in an effort to get my attention. Gee, I thought, what friendly people they know that I am from the States and want to let me know that I am welcome in their fair city.

Suddenly I discovered the reason for their frantic gestures. Directly across from me, leading the caravan that I was about to pass, was a member of the world's finest police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police! He, at the moment, was wearing his most stylish leet, his eyes beaming like searchlights as he focused them upon their poor insipid traveler, who forever more will believe the signs when they say "City Limits, 25 miles per hour." Because there was nothing else that I could do, I smiled weakly and passed, as I now was the undisputed leader of the pack with the guardian of the law directly behind me. I am probably the only person in the history of Sussex that drove through the city with an advanced case of St. Vitus Dance.

I bid au revoir to "Dairytown" and the bow of my little ship pointed to the railroad centre of the Maritimes, Moncton. Like the C. N. R. I arrived on time and after refueling my locomotive, I gave the all aboard sign and headed for the "wide open spaces." Long, wide strips of cement lined with tall sturdy trees guided me as I raced over the beautiful countryside, dodging in and out of small towns like a frightened rabbit until the racing wheels of the "Green Goose" crossed the invisible line that separates New Brunswick from Nova Scotia. Only a few more miles before reaching Amherst, a neat little city that claimed an aunt and an uncle of mine as two of its proud citizens. Daylight gave way to dusk and the landscape was now dotted with

Amherst's red brick buildings came into view and I caused nary a ripple of excitement as I drove through the centre of town, then onto Victoria Street East until I turned into the driveway of 197 and came to a halt at the back door of the Curry residence. That night the lights of the grand old house highlighted the drama that was unfolding from within as Uncle and Aunt played Mr. District Attorney while I played the part of the informer who told all about his family and friends in the States, and when I ran out of information I made up some just to make it interesting. ### Find New Site For Aklavik

OTTAWA, (CP) — Government surveyors believe they have located a new site for the remote Arctic community of Aklavik which must be moved to a new location to prevent it sinking through melting permafrost. Gordon G. Robertson, deputy minister of northern affairs, said Thursday a 10-man survey party found the site after a four-month search on the delta of the Mackenzie river. Mr. Robertson returned to Ottawa by air Wednesday night following an extended trip through the Canadian north with Northern Affairs Minister Leas. The 42-year-old settlement, largest in the Canadian Arctic, is located on the delta on the west bank of the river about 70 miles south of the Arctic ocean. It must be moved because in the heat of summer, ground warmth created by buildings and excavations and roads turns the permafrost terrain into a quagmire. Mr. Robertson said the new site is thick-wooded and there was a well-layered gravel under the topsoil.

Canada Hailed As Last Home Of British Redcoat

EDINBURGH, Scotland (Reuters)—Canada was hailed as the last home of the British redcoat in two letters to the Scottish newspaper, the Scotsman, Thursday. Prompted by the Duke of Edinburgh's inspection in Vancouver of the 72nd Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, one writer described the unit as "beautifully turned out in everything the Highland soldier would wear." The author, signing himself "Redcoat," went on: "Is it not a little pathetic that the Colonel-in-Chief of the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders should have to travel all the way to Vancouver to see a properly dressed Highland soldier?" The other writer used a more scathing tone. He called the disappearance of traditional uniforms in Britain "a disgusting state of affairs." "Perhaps, some day, when the war office has put the Household Cavalry into boiler-plate," he said, "Canada might have to send the Mounties to escort the Queen." But, he added sarcastically, "by that time it won't matter, as the German army will be in the western defence force—complete with a Hanoverian regiment in scarlet coats." The letter was signed only "W. A.T."

Army Worms Raging In Maritime Areas

By THE CANADIAN PRESS As soon as they gorge insecticide and die out in part of the Maritime areas, army worms open a fresh offensive elsewhere. They destroyed more than 1,500 acres of grain in New Brunswick's central Millville area, and now are raging in smaller areas scattered throughout the province. In Nova Scotia they've been partly stemmed in Pictou county but fresh outbreaks are reported in Cumberland and Yarmouth counties—the extreme eastern, central and western districts. Weather has been on the side of the slimy black caterpillars with the insatiable appetites. Rain has been diluting the Paris green and lime arsenate that kills them, and they breed so rapidly in the moisture that fresh generations are often on hand to take the place of any that die. GRASS CROPS HARD HIT Destruction has been worst in grass crops, but the worms aren't choosy. In parts of Cape Breton they started on root vegetables after they devoured fields of grain and clover. A minor outbreak near Dartmouth, N. S., was confined almost entirely to lettuce and beets. New Brunswick apple experts, however, say orchards are relatively safe from the ground-hugging insects. Only extreme hunger will persuade them to climb trees.
