

Being and Doing.

We are not here to feel, nor yet to know; To do is the essential thing below. The greatest poems are the noblest deeds; The greatest poet does not rhyme, but bleeds.

When one poor mortal struggles for the light And suffers for the sake of what is right, Sublime as is the universal scene, The day is little and the night is mean.

The deepest science and the highest art Are glow-worms, and the noontide sun—the heart, And all the glory of the world above Is only bravery, and only love.

—The Current.

A Queer Story.

A COUSIN OF QUEEN VICTORIA DYING IN OBSCURITY AND SECRETLY BURNED.

A few days ago there died in Preston, at an ordinary cottage house in a street on the northern side of the town, a woman of Royal descent—a second cousin of Queen Victoria, it is distinctly asserted, and, so far as the town is concerned, she went down to the grave, at the age of eighty-five "unhonored and unsung." The only mourner at the graveside was her son, whose life has been of the most checkered description. For particular reasons we purposely suppress names; if references were plainly made the living might be injured in material prospects. This personage, true to the vow she had made, gave no general clue to her character or lineage. So well was this vow kept that only a limited favored number were able to penetrate the secer. Descended from a Royal stock of peculiarly historic renown, the woman referred to passed her youthful days in the vicinity of Balmoral Castle. A braw Scotch laddie, well educated, but with no fine ancestry to boast of, wooed and won the maiden. They were married, but the marriage was not approved of in certain high quarters and the wedded couple afterward took their departure and located themselves in a neighboring town. Great secrecy was observed as to family character and associations of the deceased, and it was only three days ago we ascertained, through a special channel, that she had lived and died at Preston. A short time before her death she, with her son, went specially to London and stayed there for a week, certain arrangements being made during their sojourn in the metropolis. In her last illness she called her son to her bedside, gave him good counsel and advised him to be content with his present station in life, as any departure from it might be attended with inconvenience to his happiness. During her lifetime there were from time to time communications passing between London and Scotland and the deceased, which inclines us to think that the so-called error of her marriage was viewed in a by no means very harsh light and the events which subsequently took place strongly confirm this view. The deceased was a ripe scholar, a good linguist, possessed a well balanced mind and left behind her many things bearing Royal descent. These, we understand, are about to be, if they have not already been, sent to a certain quarter. A voluminous correspondence has been committed to the flames by order of certain authorities and a diary kept by husband and wife has shared the same cruel fate. Many of the books bore marginal notes in ink, and these, too, have been subjected to the same fiery ordeal. In accordance with instructions officially given, all manuscripts and letters have been destroyed, while some articles have been sent off to London and Scotland.
