Peking Paper Asks Guards To Discontinue Using Force

By VERGIL BERGER
PEKING (Reuters)—The Peking People's daily has called on China's militant young Red Guards to stop using force in pushing the "great proletarian cultural revolution."

A newspaper editorial stressing the need for civility and discipline was published Sunday, just before the start of a planned three-day demonstration at the Soviet Embassy in recently renamed Struggle Against Revisionism Street.

Observers here think the demonstration might be intended partly as an answer by the Red Guards to a Russian protest against what Moscow has described as their "hooligan pranks" outside the Soviet embassy last week.

Thousands of leaflets were distributed throughout Peking Sunday announcing the demonstrations. They included directions to get to the embassy.

The map and the fact that workmen were building temporary lavatories near the building indicated a well-organized mass rally was in the offing.

IGNORE PROTEST
The Soviet protest note published in Moscow Saturday and not mentioned in newspapers here, complained of Red Guard activity at the Russian embassy.

For a week the Red Guards' spearhead of the Mao Tse-tung's cultural revolution have been swarming all over the city, campaigning against people and things they consider to represent old or Western ideas and culture.

The Red Guards appeared to be meeting resistance from some of the targets of their campaign.

Chinese-speaking foreign diplomats said that among the hundreds of thousands of notices posted all over Peking this weekend they saw one announcing that eight Red Guards and a member of the Communist young pioneers had been killed.

No details of the nine deaths or confirmation from other sources were available here. In cases of homes being raided, reporters observed that the owners did not resist the scores of teenagers who swarmed inside.

ELDERLY BEATEN
Individuals, many of them old, have looked helpless while being beaten or humiliated by crowds of slogan-chanting Red Guards and children.

During the weekend, a number of men and women, some with shaven heads, were seen being thrown roughly into trucks full of teenagers and driven away. Others have been made to wear or carry placards denouncing themselves.

The editorial in the Peking People's Daily told the Red Guards to emulate the discipline of the army and be as loyal to party chairman Mao as are army officers and men, instead of using force.

Speculation as to what lies behind the campaign is divided into two main streams of opinion. One side maintains that it either reflects a struggle among various groups in the Communist party leadership, or is being used as a tactic by one group.

The other side says the campaign is aimed at tightening discipline within the party and among the population as a prelude to the introduction of new policies, presumably in the economic field.

Luna XI Seen In Moon Orbit
JODRELL BANK, England (AP)—Sir Bernard Lovell, head of Britain's space-tracking station at Jodrell Bank, said Sunday night "there is no doubt that Soviet Luna XI is in orbit around the moon."

While the Russians were still officially silent about their apparent success, Lovell said the orbit appeared to be confirmed by new bursts of signals from the Soviet spacecraft Sunday night.

The signals were picked up by the giant radio telescope at Jodrell Bank as the satellite appeared above the horizon, Lovell said. Another burst of signals lasting about 10 minutes was received, and Lovell said he was convinced the satellite was in moon orbit.

Luna XI, launched Wednesday, was aimed at a near-orbit of the moon, apparently to take pictures for use in choosing a site for a manned landing.

The Jodrell Bank observatory reported the spacecraft fire its retro rockets Saturday night. Lovell said then that Luna XI had either gone into orbit, crashed on the moon or gone behind it. He said it had not made a soft landing.

The Russians normally announce space successes at once. With the successful orbiting of the satellite still unreported from the Soviets, there was speculation Luna XI had a more complicated mission, such as a return to earth. The Soviets could be waiting for completion of the entire mission before making an announcement.

Atlantic Orchestra Plays Final Concert At Centre

By MARCIA LOYND
For the final concert by The Atlantic Orchestra on the Sunday evening concert series conductor John Fenwick chose a program that was oriented toward music of the classical period. Works performed were by Gluck, Mozart and Beethoven, as well as by Srul Irving Glick of Toronto.

The concert opened with the "Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis" by Gluck. Gluck was an eighteenth-century composer who tried to rid the opera of the "tragic" element and to make the music serve the drama. In this overture which was revised by Richard Wagner the dramatic import of the music is apparent from the very opening. Perhaps Wagner's revision could be considered a bit romantic, but the restraint of the work by the orchestra was quite good. The strings had a full vibrant sound and the entire ensemble captured the dramatic aspect of the work.

"Pan" by Srul Irving Glick, last of the newly-commissioned works, was next on the program. Originally conceived as a dance sketch, it is a short work in a harmonic idiom, not atonal or experimental as have been many of the new works. As with the others, this new work makes excellent use of the resources of The Atlantic Orchestra, not depending solely on the string section, but making imaginative use of the other sections of the orchestra, woodwinds, brasses, and percussion.

The work is interesting and contrasts an opening slow section built on a four-note harp figure with a lighter scherzo-like theme. After a lyrical section the scherzo and slow section return.

COME TO FORE
In the "Serenade No. 12 in C Minor" by Mozart the winds of the orchestra came to the fore. The work is for double wind quartet, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons. Ensemble playing was generally good, although intonation was occasionally a problem. The first and second movements were played straightforwardly and well, but the minuet seemed a bit heavy for Mozart. Dynamics seemed to be forced at times, to the detriment of the music.

The only work after the intermission was Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8 in F Major." This work is usually passed by for some of the more well-known Beethoven symphonies. It is a lighter vein than the works surrounding it, but it is pleasantly original, although not strikingly original.

The orchestra played the music.

floodlit with electric bulbs. Girls used umbrellas to keep his portrait protected from a constant, drenching rain.

In Tainan, Wushi and Soochow, marchers remained in a festive mood, even applauding foreigners as our bus stopped alongside.

Up to this point there had been no sign of violence. It was in Hangchow that I first saw evidence of destruction, when middle (high school) students desecrated a Buddhist temple. They probably were members of the ultra-nationalistic Red Guard organization.

Just before I arrived at Lin Yin temple, a detachment of teen-agers had defiled the images of Buddha and pasted on the two large temples crude signs.

'VERY GOOD THING'
Questioned through my interpreter, the head monk was reported to have said that "this is probably a very good thing."

As Lin Yin temple is a national monument, the vandals made only the symbolic gesture of breaking one bench and throwing a small Buddha to the ground.

We passed the crowd on the road soon after, strutting back to town to drum and cymbal, banners high, in search of bourgeois signs. At 10:30 p.m., they knocked down, near my hotel, a marble monolith commemorating the visit of an ancient dynasty emperor. The pieces lay on the ground as we drove to the railway station the next morning.

My guide said similar demonstrations would be taking place all over the country on Aug. 24 and 25. At Fushan I saw evidence of this. Commune members had broken a granite grave-
