

Falconry Tried Near Vancouver

NEWTON, B.C. (CP) — The sport of falconry, popular in 18th-century England, is being revived in this town 16 miles south-east of Vancouver.

George Galicz trains his young male and female peregrine falcons. The striking blue birds are difficult to train, requiring infinite patience and hard work.

An enthusiastic live bird and animal collector, Galicz and his friends, Frank Beebe and Dave Hancock of Vancouver Island, hunted the birds on Queen Charlotte Islands.

Falcons nest on high ledges and reaching them is hazardous. They look down in being lowered from a higher ledge by a rope and captured half a dozen baby birds which had feathered out and were about ready to fly.

Training started with a lure made of pigeon wings and fresh meat or a chicken head attached to the end of a lead string. At first the lure is thrown only a short distance for the tethered bird to retrieve. Gradually it is thrown farther until the falcon has to fly in order to pounce.

The bird is encouraged to go higher and higher until it understands the objective of grabbing the prey quickly. Later it is introduced to the art of capturing, without harming, wild game. The falcon may be 1,500 feet high when the handler flushes a quarry from the underbrush.

Opening lead—queen of clubs. The way Sylvia could misapprehend some of the simplest things when she first started to play was a revelation to her harried partners.

The most remarkable part of Sylvia's game, though, was her seeming ability to distort the most elementary principles of play and end by twisting them to her own advantage, much to the discomfort of her opponents.

Take this rule everybody knows about second hand playing low. Thus, if a low spade were led from dummy, the most normal thing for East to do would be to play low. This type of play is so commonplace it would not be mentioned here except that Sylvia one day carried the principle a step further. When West opened the Queen of clubs Sylvia naturally played the three from dummy. This play might astound some readers, but to Sylvia it was the automatic play. Hadn't she been taught to play second hand low. No one had bothered to tell Sylvia this business of second hand low applied to defender's play and not declarer's.

West was so delighted with the success of his opening lead he continued with the jack of clubs, hoping for continued success. Sylvia, by this time, seeing no sense in following a rule which she didn't understand in the first place, took the jack with the king.

With a losing heart and two losing spades still in her hand, and facing an apparently hopeless contract, she decided to grab whatever tricks she could. So she ruffed one of dummy's little clubs and played the ace of diamonds and another diamond to the king.

In dummy for the last time, she cashed the ace of clubs, discarding a heart, and then played dummy's last club, shaking a spade. This last club, somehow or other, held the trick, much to Sylvia's amazement. She thereupon commanded a spade and made five diamonds to the king.

Later analysis showed the only way to make the hand was to duck the opening lead.

A little knowledge, shrewdly misapplied, can do wonders.

The Happy Tumbler

The truly happy will confess it. And find some method to express it.

—Old Mother Nature.

Redtail the Hawk sat in his favorite tree at the edge of the Green Forest from which he could look all over the Green Meadows. Earlier that morning he had made a discovery which was altogether pleasing. In fact it was not pleasing at all. He had discovered that his cousin, Harrier the Marsh Hawk and Mrs. Harrier, had arrived on the Green Meadows. They are called Marsh Hawks because they are most often seen flying over marshy ground, wet meadows and other low ground. The day before then Redtail was over there they had been nowhere to be seen. It must be that they had just arrived from their winter home in the South.

Redtail looked all over the Green Meadows, but saw nothing of either Harrier or Mrs. Harrier. "Perhaps they have gone on and are not going to stay here this year," thought Redtail happily. You see he was a bit selfish. The Green Meadows were his favorite hunting grounds because so many Mice lived there in the grass. He didn't want to share that hunting ground. The fewer the hunters the easier it would be to catch all the Mice he and Mrs. Redtail would need for themselves now and the children a little later. Then Redtail happened to look up in the sky. Right away he knew that his two cousins had not moved on. They were up there in the sky flying as most Hawks love to fly.

"I wonder if they are watching for Mice from up there. They are pretty high for that. Still, I have done it as high as that myself," thought Redtail as he watched the others circle.

Suddenly something seemed to have happened to one of them. It was Harrier. He came tumbling down out of the sky over and over. He was falling just as Redtail had seen a bird that had been shot by a terrible gun fall. It seemed to be quite helpless. Redtail looked this way and that to see if there was a hunter with a dreadful gun. There wasn't. What could have happened to Cousin Harrier?

Perhaps Redtail didn't feel too badly after all. If that other big cousin of his had been killed Mrs. Harrier might not stay alone. She might move on where she would have a chance of finding another mate. Redtail leaned forward a little the better to see just where his falling cousin would strike the ground.

He didn't strike the ground. No, just before he reached the ground he caught himself on his big wings and a moment later was flying up in the sky again. He was screaming as he did so. It wasn't a scream of fright or of anger. It was a scream of pure happiness. Some one else was screaming happily too. It was Mrs. Harrier, still high in the sky. Up, up, up, up flew Harrier to join her. Then they circled around each other for a few minutes. Harrier tumbled again but this time it was a very short tumble. He merely tumbled a couple of somersaults. He was doing it for the same reason that boys and girls turn somersaults in the hay. He was doing it for fun. He was tumbling in the air because he loved to tumble. Perhaps he was showing off too. Perhaps he was showing Mrs. Harrier what a wonderful flyer he really was. Few other birds could tumble that way and catch themselves on their wings when they wanted to and not get hurt. He was a happy tumbler.

Clash on Prosperity of U. K. Shipbuilding As Inquiry Opens

LONDON (Reuters) — A clash over the prosperity of Britain's shipbuilding industry Thursday opened a government inquiry aimed at settling a year-old wage dispute involving 200,000 workers.

The argument, between union leader Ted Hill and N. A. Sloan, director of the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation, came as nearly 2,000,000 striking shipyard and factory workers returned to their jobs after their walkout was called off in response to a government appeal.

Hill, dubbed Terrible Ted by the press, was a driving force behind the shipyard strike which started 18 days ago, halting building and repair work on some 600 ships. He heads the powerful Boiler-makers Society.

The court of inquiry, whose decisions will not be binding, later will hear the arguments of employers and union leaders involved in an allied wage dispute in the manufacturing industry. Both shipyard and factory workers—some 3,000,000 men—had demanded a 10-per-cent wage increase.

The court heard Sloan complain that Japan is overtaking Britain as the world's greatest shipbuilding nation. Hill admitted the Japanese industry is expanding, but maintained Britain's order books are so fat that shipowners are reluctant to place new orders because they would have to wait so long for delivery.

He said the industry's prosperity—gross profits rose by 13 per cent in 1955, he said—justified higher wages.

Sloan said that since the fall of 1954, workers' earnings increased by 20 per cent and the cost of living by eight per cent. The return to work Thursday morning was punctuated by protests, new disputes, rumblings of discontent and lack of work. Many workers complained their leaders "sold out" Tuesday by calling off the strikes before a general cash settlement was reached.

The majority returned in a "wait-and-see" frame of mind, read to resume the strike if government-sponsored talks are unsuccessful.

Meanwhile, the national coal board offered 350,000 men working state-owned coal mines a five-per-cent pay increase. If the offer is accepted, the men will get up to nine shillings ($1.26) more a week.

Safety Pin Was At Least Closed

OTTAWA (CP) — A missing safety-pin had the Ottawa police busy for a time. Baby-sitter Mrs. Philippe Gosselin of Hull saw only two safety-pins in the crib of Joanne Lefleur, infant daughter of Ottawa police constable Larry Lefleur, and there should have been three. She called Mrs. Lefleur, who was at work, and who called her husband at police headquarters. He was out on traffic duty, but a police cruiser picked up Mrs. Lefleur at her office and rushed her home where she picked up the baby and took her to the General Hospital. Meanwhile another police car had picked up Constable Lefleur, taking him to the hospital too. There an x-ray disclosed the pin in little Joanne's stomach, but it was closed, and she was returned home to wait for nature to take its course. "It was an open or but case," a hospital official said.
