FAITHFUL

By MARGARET GORMAN NICHOLS

SHAPTER 6

The next day Iris told the hopeful news of the contest to Dr. Tracy.

"So there's going to be an opera singer in your family, eh?" he said grinning. "Behind the success of most famous people are other people who deserve equally as much credit. You've been paying for her music lessons out of your salary, haven't you?"

"It wasn't much, Louis."

When she went out to lunch, he called Mark. "Listen, young man, I admit I'm rather gullible but this contest money given to an obscure teacher sounds like one of your numerous charities. If Iris knew it, she'd be furious."

"You win. I am the backer to whom Sabine has given a thoroughly ridiculous name. I feel like Santa Claus. Don't spoil it."

"You sound very serious."

"I am so serious I'm sentimental. Whenever I see a yacht for sale, I want to buy it, kidnap Iris, marry her, and take her cruising on the Mediterranean, take her away from her family and—you."

Louis chuckled. "That black hair and, those grave eyes have become very dear to me. If Annette could hear me say that, she'd leave for Reno tonight."

The wade home that week was a bedlam of excitement. Eve could not control her soaring hopes. When it came to the subject of what she should wear Saturday night, Iris said at the dinner table. "Wear my gold dress. Mother can cut it down to fit you."

Her mother interrupted. "But you'll want to wear that, Iris."

"I can wear the green."

Tommy said, "I have to work Saturday night. Worst luck," and Iris saw his slender hands, dark with the grime and grease of the gas station, sensitive, boyish hands not meant for manual labor.

To escape Eve's continuous practicing she took long walks at night, going down the familiar paths in the dark where she and Joel had walked so often, both happily and bitterly quarreling. Clarity of mind and peace came to Iris during those lonely night walks. She did not seem to be fighting any longer, and the door that had been closed so long had been opened by Mark.

When she could put Joel from her mind, a strange happiness came to her, a happiness from within which she did not quite understand and which she did not question. It was not to be shared with anyone else, that feeling, and when she returned home and went to her room and saw her face, her eyes startled her. Iris thought, "What is happening to me? I must not fight it. I must give in to it."

Saturday night the old house was in a positive fever. It took both Selina and Iris to dress the diminutive Eve who emerged in the gold dress from the shy page from a medieval court into a temperamental prima donna. Eve stormed, raged, and shouted from sheer excitement and nervousness. Selina wept also and angrily left the room, declaring, "She'll forget everything and fail. She'll disgrace me."

Iris, a slim princess in her green dress with the bodice made of sheer petals that fell over her white shoulders, put her arms around the trembling younger girl and made her nervous voice calm when she spoke.

"You are more talented than any other person who'll be there. Don't sing to an audience of mothers and fathers, Eve. Sing to the audience of the opera. A good singer is a good actress and you must put all your feelings and depth into your voice."

Eve's misty eyes looked up.

"Everything depends upon this—for you and for me. If I do win, Iris, you can live your life that has never belonged to you."

Iris smiled. "I don't think I've been unlucky at all."

When they went downstairs, Mark was there trying not to look embarrassed at Mrs. Wade's effusive gushing over him. Again Iris saw the warm light come to his eyes and suddenly Eve's shaking hand was not in hers and her mother's flushed face vanished. There was no one but Mark, tall and tanned and in evening clothes, waiting at the head of the walnut stairs for her.

Selina said, "I'll call you at Mary's as soon as it's over."

Mark stopped the car for gasoline at a station on North Charles street. Out of the small enclosure came Tommy to fill the car. Iris thought, "What a strange assorted family we are. Eve is going to win ten thousand dollars tonight and fame, I'm going to a party, and Tommy is a greasy boy working as a laborer."

It was the sight of a pretty girl in the large car that made Tommy look up. Briefly he met Iris's eyes through the windshield and then quickly looked away. Iris thought, "He won't speak to me! He doesn't want me to be ashamed of him."

"Tommy!"

Mark asked, "Do you know the boy?"

"He's my brother."

Tommy came to the side of the car and awkwardly pulled off his uniform cap.

"This is Mr. Christian, Tommy. Didn't you recognize me?"

"Oh, sure. Has Eve gone?"

"Yes, and with our prayers."

"I hope she wins."

Mark thrust considerably more than the cost of the gasoline into Tommy's hand, said "Thank you, Tommy," and drove off quickly, and his admiration for the girl beside him doubled because of her loyalty to her brother.

The guests had all arrived at Mary's. They stood about in intimate little groups talking and laughing and sipping Mary's incomparable drinks.

Mary North was a small pretty woman with exquisite taste in her clothes, her apartment, her parties, and her friends. Her husband, a brilliant young scientist, had been killed in a laboratory explosion two years before and Iris knew that her endless pursuit of pleasure and entertainment was the outlet of a grief-stricken woman who could not permit herself leisure to contemplate the tragic death two years ago when they had brought her husband home to her.

"I'm so glad you're here," she said, greeting Iris and Mark.

In the bedroom Iris told her about Eve.

"Always thinking of Eve," said Mary, small and beautiful in white lace. "Iris, darling, do stop thinking about Eve long enough to realize that the gentleman of gentlemen is falling wildly in love with you."

"When Mark counts the women in his life when he's eighty," said Iris, touching her dark hair, "I'll be around the fiftieth."

The evening went quickly as all evenings went quickly at Mary's The small and intimate group of Mary's friends, which included successful commercial artists and illustrators, men and women who wrote reviews of music and the theatre, and one formerly famous musical comedy actress who now proudly declared she was "only a mother," took Iris at face value, though often they wondered about the beautiful brunette with an obscure background to whom all men were attracted and whom all women liked.

Across the room her eyes met Mark's who looked at her with shameless adoration. "Let nothing happen to this," she thought solemnly. "It's apart from my real life and sweeter because its unspoken. I would rather it remained unspoken forever than for it to become involved with Joel and Mother and the ugly side of my life about which he knows nothing."

Mary approached Mark.

"Aren't you very exclusive, drinking alone?"

"I wasnt aware of it.' he said, smiling. "I was thinking of the Mediterranean just then."

Mary's hand touched his.

"Mark, dear, the Mediterranean is blue and Iris's dress is green," and when they saw Iris suddenly get up and go into the little waiting room and Mark started to follow, Mary said, "No. Don't She wants to be alone when her sister calls. Mark, my dear, what are you waiting for with Iris?"

"I am waiting until she can belong to me and to me only."

He waited a long time, his eyes on the door of the writing room. With the party in progress, he knew he could not hear the telephone ring and there was nothing for him to do but wait until he was sure that Eve had called.

At midnight he could wait no longer. Crossing the room, he opened the door and stepped in the quiet room. Iris was standing by the window, her back to him. Her hair was gleaming in the halflight, her face uplifted.

She was not frightened when he put his hands on her bare arms. Instead she leanded her head against his shoulder and said quietly. "Eve won." But her voice broke with emotion. He saw her lashes flat against her face but he did not know that she was thinking," Mark, hold me, hold me. Keep me like forever. It's you I want and love—though I can never say it."

Should he tell her now? Should he say, "Iris, marry me now. Let me put behind you everything that troubles you. Let's make this dream of mine of a Mediterranean honeymoon real. It can be real."

No. He could not. And he hated the time that had to pass before he could ask her.
