CENTRAL ACADEMY.

The half-yearly examination of the pupils at the Central Academy was held on last Monday. During the past term, the number on the roll has exceeded one hundred. It will be seen from the synopsis laid before the Trustees, and which we here publish, that the number of classes is very great: yet from the range of subjects taught, as well as the difference in ages and capacity of the pupils, we dare say, it could not well be otherwise. Indeed the Academy seems to have reached that point in all educational establishments, at which a farther increase of pupils adds little or nothing to the labors of the masters, as it would be difficult to find a youth, who would not find his exact level in some of the classes actually taught at present. In the higher departments of Greek and Latin, there are not many; but those that are, translate and analyse in a manner which bears testimony at once to the talents of the pupils, and the scholarship and zeal of the masters. The country students who have obtained the scholarships, have advanced as far as the fifth book of Cæsar's Commentaries, which they read and construe with great accuracy; in Mathematics, as far as quadratic equations inclusive; some progress in Geometry, and can do anything within the reach of plane Trigonometry. Five of them have been successful in English Composition. This assuredly is great progress in eighteen months. The very highest departments of Mathematics—the Calculus and Physical Astronomy—none have ever yet reached in the Academy; indeed we question whether any have in the Lower Provinnces, nor is it likely that any will, until a scholarship be founded for that express purpose, and to be competed for by those only who have completed the junior Mathematics. In English Composition, several pieces of great merit were read by the successful competitors. In the way of written translation, the best piece was by Master George Hodgson. It was a history (Memoires de Tous, vol. 6,) of the celebrated forgery on the banks of England, Vienna and St. Petersburg, attempted to be practised, (and in the case of the two latter banks with complete success,) by the French Republican Government towards the close of the Revolution. We should like to see this piece published; but that it would be likely to prove more useful to forgers than to bankers.

In conclusion, we have only to add that most of the classes have been determined from a Register, in which is marked the place each pupil may occupy on the last day in each week, during the term.
