MARY HAWORTH

Divorce Lists Qualifications Desired In Marriage Partner

Dear Mary Haworth: I am a divorcee, 33, with one child, less than a year old. I've had much professional counselling, concerning the failure of my marriage; consequently feel better prepared to succeed in a second try, if I marry again.

There isn't a chance of returning to my former husband, who refuses to admit any share in our joint failure.

Although I would like to marry again I find myself reverting to my former pattern of staying at home, not circulating. I very much want to meet a reasonable, intelligent, stable, likeable man, interested in country living, children, family teamwork and community service.

Where do I start? Should I plot a course, as though I were undertaking a business career? Or should I be simply content, as I am, caring for my child and hoping that wanting a husband will attract one to me? Would there be any value in moving to another place, when the baby is of an age that I can take a full time job?

NOT SHY

Baby and I are attractive and win gratifying attention when we venture out of our secluded routine; but while I'm not a shy or retiring person, I am simply not aggressive about corralling men. And the men who are aggressive in pursuing me, so far, aren't good marriage prospects.

Knowing the town from which I write, have you any suggestions how to proceed to acquire a good man? I work weekend mornings, so can't attend church services, though I think this might be a good start. If I am at fault I welcome your constructive criticism. G.L.

NEUROTIC BIAS?

Dear G.L.: You speak of your former pattern of staying at home not circulating; and say that you are relapsing into it again. This disposition, and your vague awareness of it, suggests that you probably are handicapped in the social arena by a neurotic bias towards helpless type passivity.

By such passivity I mean a mixture of infantile dependence and ingrained expectation of ill treatment in your largely self defeating conduct of life.

Dr. Edmund Bergler's many books — Divorce Won't Help (Harpers) for example—abound with case histories to show the passive neurotic character predilection for unhappiness. It seems he elects it, compulsively rather than "straighten up and fly right," along the traditional routes that lead to normal affectional security.

Possibly the professional counselling you've had, thus far, has brought you to the verge of realizing that you may be the witless architect of your frustrations in love to date. And now you are wondering dimly how to renounce all that, and hit a new stride.

OTHER-CENTERED

Where to start? Start just where you are, and become an other-centered person. Get to know your neighbors in a friendly unobtrusively attentive spirit. Be really alive to their existence. It is a psychological truism that one is alive only to the extent that he (or she) is realistically involved in other lives, in terms of shared activities based on common interests or kindred concerns. And in this sense, you are too little alive, at present.

Moving to another location wouldn't change the texture of your experience, so long as your self - engrossment cuts you off from the surrounding society and keeps you at an infantile level of wantingness—not doing anything much, in a self-reliant adult outgoing way, to bring about the sort of companionship that endures rewardingly.

Don't emphasize finding a good man. Aim rather at growing to man. im rather at growing to woman whose life is happily sustained by love of God and sensible devotion to the right opportunities and associations that are His special gift to you. M.H.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Blue Mondays Recall Days Of Lazy Summer Sunshine

We get them — the fall Mondays with not enough blue in the sky "to make a sailor a pair of trousers," or favor the housewife wash. Low-ceilinged with cloud—and below, showers on the damp fields and scarves of gray mist above the hills.

Then it is we recall so easily the sun-laved summery Island days. Instead of the chilly November wind, we see again a gay breath stirring the haylands to ripples of green. In fancy the daisies dance their stately measures in a starry pasture or along the farm lane. So lovely too those dewy mornings when the sun painted goldenly the far side of the valley—there was sunshine then and to spare! the dreamy noontime we remember, the birdsong drowsy or momentarily hushed, and a lazy haze of blue lying soft on the far countryside. How sweet too the perfumed dusk with purpling shadows over all the hills and road and dales, until all was dim and downy-soft, about, and a first star blossomed magically over the mill in the peaceful meadows of the night.

Gone now those days? Passed. And the year bent and a bit weary, and we think lonely as are the aged for the days and kin and friends that were, walks slowly up the last rise of way. But pauses now and then, not only to rest a moment but also to turn at a thought and look back along the trail. As we have wonderingly seen in the long ago, an aged one of the farms about stop in a stroll to look back and out upon the scene about. Maybe in a last sight—seeing volumes there younger folks could never see until they too in their turn, would also find like visions. For the past, with all its change and history, the shade and sunshine of the pilgrim trek was superimposed on the familiar scene spread about.

The year is old. But according to the lights in the childrens' eyes when we visited a while this evening at the house across the lane, the best is yet to be—the Christmas season ahead.

believe she means it. You see" he confided to Mack. "your grandmother has never altogether grown up."

"Or else—' we laughed.

"Or else" he grinned "she's going back to her little-girls years to stay!"

When Monday's skies have no blue, and showers descend and gray mist wraps the hills, what else is there to do but go back to gather daisies and walk the sunlaved paths of those delightful summer days we knew?

Until tomorrow—Diary—Goodnight.

"See!" Alex, the two and a half year lad looked up from one of the catalogues that are educating him remarkably well "here's a Mommie" he smiled "and a Baby in a manger—yes" he nodded "see the hay! And there are cows—and heres a lambie—a dear little lambie watching by."

"Come it's your bedtime" some one reminded him.

"No, no! Let's look at it all over again! Please! another time."

"And what would you wish for Christmas?" Mack questioned us, busy with pen and paper compiling his list.

"A pen!" Granddaughter replied for us smartly "Or maybe refills" she chuckled

"No—a doll" we said.

"Yes," James smiled. "I do
