ELLEN'S DIARY

Chatting With That Man Made One Feel Optimistic

So March the variable one was come this morning, in a light cloud cover, a typical March day and wind. "This is a typical March day," we said. And recalled that another who of he had turned aside to enter upon that strange and lone road which leads away from all the known earthly trails, had been accustomed in his time to meet not only March's changeable weather, but that of the other months as well in discharging the duties that were his. This was a near neighbor to "the other farm" the Rural Mail Carrier of one, our Mailman of years, who at weekend left his own and his legion of friends and went the way of all flesh. In stature, he was tall and spare, an industrious man and kind, well loved and much respected in his family, which is, we always think, the hallmark of a good man.

We pictured him so easily this morning when we spread a few pieces of wash to the line. Saw in mind, his horse stop by the mailbox at the house on the hill, ease then down the decline, heard the jingle of bells as the animal gained speed along the level stretch which brought him presently to our box at lane's end. In summer it was, of course, the wagon wheels we would hear. And often threaded in, intermingling with that sound, if one chanced to be down in his neighborhood, would be that of his song. And no matter then the cares, the disappointments of our morning, if the breakfast loaf had been under — or overdone, and not to our liking as a housewife, or the sitting had abandoned her nest at a whim, or

MARY HAWORTH

Mother Hankers For Son — Has Need To Be Needed

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: My problem is my husband's widowed mother, 60, who plans to retire in two years and move near my husband and me; or move in with us.

My husband, her only child, is very kind and careful of her feelings, so she imposes on him. She invites herself for visits, tells us how to run our lives, etc. We visit her often, are very good to her, etc., but she wants all of our time and puts when she doesn't get it.

She lives some distance away, but not too far for a long distance call each weekend to tell us how bored she is ("with all these old people"! She has a large house, a job, is surrounded by relatives and friends, and other tell us how active she is.

When she isn't telephoning or inviting herself over, she is asking relatives and friends in our town to let us know she's written them that she's not well, or she's bored, etc., so we will call her more often. And when we call she wants to "see" us.

This upsets me and we have no peace. I am afraid it will be worse when she retires. She'll be here every day, or on the telephone. How should we settle it? Wait? Talk to her? She's difficult to talk with: gets angry or cries. Please advise us. V.F.

help is implicitly antagonistic, rather than perceptive and open-minded. It is definitely more self-concerned than wisely objective.

If you were other-centered and generous, by training or natural disposition, rather than primarily self-serving in your social relationships, you would cope with the in-law situation a day at a time, instead of wishing and trying, with vehement intensity, to dispose of it once-and-for-all.

It is this selfish, defensive, resistant pique on your part that magnifies the whole problem inordinately, thus making it insoluble, on any terms that you would prescribe, if you knew precisely what terms of the sort to spell out and enforce.

So much for background. As for advice: why don't you be diplomatic, to find a worthy new husband for your activist mother — in-law.

After all she must be something of a catch, with her large house, earned income, no dependents, many friends, community interests, and the like. What, if anything, are you doing to bring opportunities for good married companionship to her attention?

If you were a giving-type person yourself, with a lively imagination, a hopeful disposition and a fund of kindly af-

TRICK OF THE CHEF

To prevent fresh flams in shell from being "sandy," cover them with cold water, add 2 tbsp. cornmeal, and let stand 2 hrs. or more in a cold place. The clams open their shells to eat the cornmeal and release the sand. Et voilà!
