ing and keeping perfectly still while doing so. This was one of those times when didn't mother come home? If there was danger, why didn't she come and tell them? What was the matter with everybody? Of course they couldn't know that mother was just as anxious to come to them as they were to have her come. She wasn't far away, but she was herself filled with a great fear. It wasn't fear for herself, but for those precious young squirrels. It was because of them that she did not move. You see, she was afraid that if she did move their danger might be just so much greater. She was afraid but wise, was that little gray mother.

Meanwhile the silence seemed to be fairly shrieking, "Danger! danger! danger!" Yet it was giving no hint as to what that danger was. Look as they would, the young squirrels could see nothing whatever to be afraid of.
