—Lord Lansdowne and Lord Wolseley are both in favor of conscription. They want more men for the army and find that these men are not forthcoming. Says Lord Lansdowne: "It is a matter of uncertainty how long we shall be able to go on as a present. We are the only European power which does not resort in some form or other to conscription. We are, it is an open secret, going to try and create fresh inducements to young men to join the service; but, of course, the time may come when even these inducements may fail to attract a sufficient number of recruits."
