MARY HAWORTH

Critics Of Spoiled Youth Defend Badgered Parents

There has been a rash of letters in your column recently from, or about, parents whose grown married children seem to be making outrageous demands on them. And what bothers me is, these children all seem to be around my age, 30, born during the later depression period.

Among others there was the married daughter who expects her mother to do everything and come running on demand, to babysit. Yet this same daughter (her sister says) neglects little child courtesies and gestures of affection such as bringing the children to see Grandma on Easter Sunday.

Then there is the married daughter who feels that her Dad should share his modest means (down to the last penny) by her household, because he can't take it with him' become the wife.

To cap the climax, there is the 28-year-old daughter, a highly educated on scholarships, who wants a $900 handout from his salaryed Dad for a trip to New Zealand.

Take it from me, speaking as a member of this spoiled generation, these parents don't owe their children a thing! The children ought to delight in the fact that their parents have the time and the means in the autumn of life to relax a bit, before they're really old.

My husband and I take pride in our independence, in meeting our present needs and planning future solvency. Not that our parents aren't devoted to us; they are. But we wouldn't think of asking them for money.

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I am fascinated by the letter about the married man, 28 son of a "depression years" marriage, now just finishing of a wonderful education he got through scholarships, who wants his parents to give him a backlog of cash, in recompense for funds they didn't have to spend on him earlier.

If he were worth all the scholarships he received, he shouldn't need that handout money. Moreover, if his family has that kind of money to spare, they ought to give it to some other child in need. And many good parents need a booster shot of outside opinion, from time to time, to steady their resolve in saying "No" as they should, in this sensitive matter. Thus your comments may be helpful.

DEAR CORRESPONDENTS: You're both right. It's no use!

ELLEN'S DIARY

Moan Rises In Crescent High Over The Old Mill

"Ah, ha, Mr. Rabbit - so there you are!" we exclaimed in the silence of the yard this morning. One of the lowest of chores we were doing at the time, nevertheless one which in the overall scheme of things could be, as we have seen it, discarded in more ways than one, by kindling an unwanted outdoor fire, if not carefully done. We were carrying the pot of (cooked) manure from the kitchen - stove to empty it to a sizable tin container by the garden. When it is full, we remind the farmers to add it to the stable or sty-cleavings in the manure spreader, and off it goes to work on the fields. It may grow a plant, but it is in a good look symbol for us to pick up on a summer - stroll. Or maybe a day's work in the garden, and a crystal ball for some maid, as she tells the petals away.

As James puts the ashes in the spreader he is bound to put the same question to us: "What are you sure, Ellen?" We can reply, cross-or-heart, "Certain, Man!" For the ashes have been well examined before being sent to the field, last a nail or other piece of hardware from our woodpile which sometimes gathers strange sticks to it, should some day find its way with fatal effect into a stock of a cow.

"Greetings, Woman" Rabbit said, "I'm butting up-all up so a's this mawin'!"

"Oh for no good reason," we replied.

He stood on his hind feet to survey his surroundings.

"Mighty pretty rows of lettuce down in that garden," he remarked, nose wrinkling in anticipation.

"Shoo! Clear out of this!" we said, voice echoing in the prevailing quiet of the near pig-gery.

"Is there something astray, Ellen?" James inquired, appearing in the doorway of the near pig-gery.

"It's that rabbit," we explained. "He's marking his way to the garden!"

"Oh, a rabbit," he commented. "I thought perhaps it was a cow. - He's a fine big fellow, isn't he?" he offered, turning back to his work.

The shearing - that was the farmers' engorging interest day. And as always at its close, as this evening, there comes the docking of the lambs. One or two required item of the farming, which sees the younglings
