Enrichment comes to Canada! New life in the "Staff of Life" for the health and well-being of Canadian families! This is the heading of an excellent article in the Canadian Grain Journal for November. It goes on to tell us that long-awaited legislation recently passed by the Canadian Government has opened the door to enriched flour and enriched living for Canadians. After February 2nd, 1953 vitamin-enriched flour can be used in the baking of white breadstuffs, provided the product is clearly labelled as "Enriched." This step offers the Canadian families the opportunities for better health and the increased mental and physical vigor which have followed the use of enriched flour in Newfoundland, Sweden, the United States, and other countries.

The regulations dealing with enriched bread stipulate that it shall be made of enriched flour only, containing closely regulated amounts of thiamine, riboflavin, niacin and iron and may also contain calcium, a mineral needed for sound teeth and strong bones.

Enrichment of flour and bread assures us of a daily supply of B-vitamins and iron. Bread is basic and is eaten more often and in larger quantities than any other food. It is economical and therefore is eaten most often by low income families whose diets are apt to be inadequate. Enrichment in no way alters the colour or flavour of white bread and does not change the baking behavior of the flour. The only difference is the hidden advantage of added food values. Whole wheat bread is an excellent source of B-vitamins and iron but it is difficult to persuade consumers to use it generally. Unfortunately it represents only a small fraction of the total bread consumed. One retailer in Charlottetown told me recently that since we have been boosting whole wheat bread in this column he can hardly keep up with the demand, that is encouraging! Let's carry on the good work—let's shop more carefully, read labels and continue to support C. A. C.

All for this week!

"I know some of those," Henry Smith claimed, and sat down at the piano. "What would you like to hear, then?"

Jeanne began to hum an air, and as she hummed, the man at the piano broke into an accompaniment.

"That is it," she cried, really interested now. "I only heard it once; and do not even know the name of it."

Henry Smith sang; carelessly at first, and without much feeling, for the girl began to rebel him. But the music and the words, both very charming and very French, took hold of him; and when he struck the final chord he turned round naturally for the approval of his listeners.

Lepine had gone; but Jeanne Lederer was staring at him, with eyes that were wide and humid. There was no aversion in her face now, but an expression which Henry Smith wonderingly identified as pity. There was compassion in her voice, too, as she said quickly:

"But that was wonderful, Monsieur. Sing again; sing anything. I could listen for ever."

'twas the night before washday . . .

'twas the night before Washday
When spirits are low
Just thinking of Monday
And work we hate so—

The clothes were all sorted
And put in to soak
But the scrubbing tomorrow—
The thought was no joke!

Then thinking of Christmas
I cheered up a bit.
An idea struck me—
I cried "This is it!"

So clipping this ad
From the paper, with zest,
I placed it at once
Where he'd see it the best.

Now I know by his eyes
And a slight hidden grin,
He's taken the hint
And our order is in!

And so for the New Year
I'll do as they say,
"Make Washday a pleasure
The New Connor way!"
