Following the break at the Capitol Bowling Alleys on Sunday night in which a cigaret vending machine was robbed of about $100.00, a second break was made sometime Monday night at the grocery store on King Street operated under the name of Aeneas' Grocery. In this break, a cigaret vending machine was broken open and cash estimated to amount to about $200.00 was stolen.

The front door of the store was forced in by some heavy instrument and following the pattern of the Capitol break no goods or cigarets were taken as far as could be estimated by the owner. The break was discovered on Tuesday morning by Mrs. Joseph Clough, who operates the store, when she went to open up for business and the police were immediately notified.

The thief, in departing left by way of the front door which he did not bother to close thence through the back yard of the store taking with him the box of money from the machine. Police are searching for the thief.

DANNY KAYE IN "KNOCK ON WOOD," CAPITOL, SUMMERSIDE — A Paramount picture written, produced and directed by the talented team of Melvin Frank and Norman Panama, the story has Danny Kaye as a ventriloquist whose dummy not only talks back to him, but insults the customers as well. As this situation is considered to be slightly out of kilter to the norm, Danny is sent packing to the nearest psychiatrist. The mind doctor he consults turns out to be lovely Swedish co-star, Mai Zetterling, and in the end all Mr. Kaye falls madly in love with her.

At the same time some excellent by disreputable espionage agents swipe some blueprints and hide the documents in the hands of Danny's two dummies. Unaware of all this, Danny boy goes about his business and is promptly followed by still another gang of spies, who are after the plans themselves.

The result is a succession of completely wacky mix-ups, with the bewildered ventriloquist finding himself pursued all over the place, not only by the rival gangs, but by the police when the spies start killing each other off in his hotel room. As a matter of fact, Danny is blamed for all of the homicides and is emblazoned in the headlines as the "red-headed ripper."

Let's Talk It Over

There is a very wide gap between knowing and doing among the pupils of our schools. It isn't so much that they don't know. It's that they don't do. Many of the mistakes made in their written work are made because they are creatures of more or less slovenly habits and mis-spelled common words, use wrong contractions, fail to use apostrophes, and break other simple rules of punctuation, most of which they know perfectly. In the brain the knowledge is stored like frozen assets, but habits of writing it down correctly have not been established. This takes a lot of drill, drill that is intensified in the lower grades, and tapers off as a multiliteracy of subjects makes necessary in the higher grades. A slow tedious process. Pupils cannot be transformed from poor spellers to good spellers in a month, or even a year. They cannot be bullied into this desirable state by threatening or subtract marks from them in examinations once every two or three months. They cannot be threatened, or cajoled into it. They must be drilled into it.

When today's business man says his young office employees can't spell does he mean that they cannot spell parallellogram, michipicoten, leguminosae, streptococcus or the like? No, these words rarely come up in business offices. The business man means they can't spell the common word of everyday use, the words they will need to spell in the business world, and for that matter, in everyday life. These common words should be given priority in school (that, of course, is what graduated spellers are for). They should be drilled thoroughly from year to year. If these words are mastered, then the teachers can turn their attention to the technical words belonging to each subject that most of the pupils will never use except when they are writing examinations. Sometimes we make these examinations an end in themselves, instead of a means to an end, training the pupil for his life outside the school walls. If congenitally poor or below average spellers master the common words, they will have carried a heavy enough burden.

By using considerable effort, you can get pupils, some pupils at least, to spell all the words in their literature, or science, or geography lesson, but you can hardly expect them to retain mastery of these words if they don't have occasion to use them again. It's a little like carrying water from a well in a leaky pail. The common words they will remember because they will be constantly using them in their writing.
