The Unlatched Door

CHAPTER NINETEEN "Why do you say this to me?" Martin Winterton demanded of Inspector Kenway. His voice sounded shrill and there was a note of querulous resentment in it.

Barbara Calendar, sitting numb and shaken in her place, - Martin's words seemed to be coming from a tremendous distance away. She saw his face and those of Nancy and the detective in an air of remoteness and unreality. "You talk as if I should be responsible for it if this man was accused and hanged for Borden's murder! What are you accusing me of?"

"I'm not accusing you of anything, Mr. Winterton," replied Kenway quietly. "I have simply stated the facts. There isn't any getting round them. A man's alibi depends on the truth or otherwise of his story that he delivered a packet here at a certain time. You say he is lying."

"I haven't said anything of the sort!" cried Martin. "I won't have you shoving responsibility on me for what I haven't done-I have troubles enough of my own!" "You say you didn't receive the packet," insisted Kenway. "Do you stick to that?"

"Certainly I do! I never saw the packet-never even heard of it till you mentioned it a minute ago. I will go into the witness-box in any court you like and swear to that!"

"And so will I!" said Nancy firmly. "Well, isn't that the same as saying the man who asserts he delivered it here is a liar?" looking from husband to wife with an exasperated expression.

"I can't help that! It isn't my fault," said Martin. "If this man says what isn't true that's his lookout. I'm not going to perjure myself to get him out of difficulties he has made for himself, and you have no right to try and make me feel I'm being unfair in not lying to help him."

"I assure you I had no intention of doing that," Mr. Winterton, Kenway protested. "All I want is to get at the truth."

"Well, you have had the truth from me!" Martin told him. "And from me, Inspector," said Nancy. "Who is this man? Why is this story of the packet so important for him? Mayn't we know?"

"There's no reason why you shouldn't," Kenway replied. "He is a man named Milvers. He was Borden's servant at the flat."

"The man who was found unconscious?" Martin was leaning forward and his voice shook.

"I saw by the papers that he had not been able to tell how he came by his injuries. Has he done so now?"

"I saw him this afternoon-in fact I came straight here from the hospital where I got his story."

"About the packet?" said Nancy. "But why is that so important, Inspector?"

"Because, Mrs. Winterton, if it is true it accounts for his movements during the time when we have reason to believe Borden was killed. It also goes to confirm his statement that he didn't know Borden was dead until I told him to do so. He says Borden rang for him about 20 minutes to 11 on Monday night. Milvers went in and saw his master putting a number of letters into a large envelope which he fastened and addressed to Mr. Winterton. He gave it to Milvers, telling him to bring it here, put it in the letter-box and return to the flat. Milvers says he obeyed that order."

Kenway paused, watching the play of emotion on the two faces.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

There's no telling where artificial insemination will end. The latest venture in this field is being tried out in England where 1,200 hens will be inseminated, with semen from males of their respective breeds. The results will be awaited with much interest by poultrymen in every section of the country. Should the venture prove a success it will obviously open up tremendous possibilities.

According to a recent issue of the Northwest "Technocrat," a mechanical raspberry picker has been successfully used near Olympia, Washington.

This remarkable gadget has a two foot bracket attached to the top of each supporting post, and tops of the canes are attached to the wires strung across these brackets. This assures the desired "off set" position for the canes which makes mechanical picking a reality.

A rubber-tired shaker grid shakes the bottom of the plants, causing the berries to drop into a moving shuttle, go to a moving screen, and then are blown-cleaned before leaving the machine.

With a three man crew this machine can harvest 15 to 20 acres per shift which would require 90 to 120 human pickers.

Such a machine could do a fine job in our blueberry farms, providing there was not too much brush and fallen trees to impede its progress. Like the artificial insemination of poultry, it has potential possibilities.

In Central Chile may be seen a red-breasted little bird that actually barks like a dog. The natives call it "quid-guld". Ref. Charles Darwin.

In the cathedral of St. Sulpice, Paris, are several giant men-eating clams weighing nearly 700 lbs. with a diameter of 5 feet. These empty shells are now used as holy-water basins. Before they came into their present use they rested under the waters of Malaysia, and anyone careless enough to step into their open jaws was sure to be caught in a death trap. Many natives have lost their lives in this manner. Hence the name "man-eating clams".

Even the venomous snakes seldom attack man if they can get out of his way. When they do attack, however, this is what happens: The two fangs lie horizontally along the bridge of the upper jaw, being brought into a vertical position when required. That movement presses the base of the fangs against the poison sac, squeezing out a single drop of poison which runs down a groove into the wound, made by the point.

Incidentally, no snake suffers from a bite by one of its own species, though repeated poison injections may prove fatal, as when one attacks another time after time. The so-called snake charmers have nothing to fear as the poison fangs are removed before they handle these reptiles. No snake charmer would live long if they did not so handle the snakes.

The real terror of shell comes from the Hawksbill turtle which lives in the warm seas of the south.

before him. They had turned to each other while he spoke and in both, doubt, incredulity, and suspicion seemed to be fighting for the mastery. As the detective's voice ceased to sound Martin seemed on the point of speaking, but Nancy anticipated him with a rush of protest:

"It isn't true, Martin! It never came! I wouldn't have kept it from you if I had seen it, and I know you would have told me!"

For several seconds they sat looking at each other apparently unconscious of the fact that they were not alone in the room. There was agonized appeal in Nancy's eyes, answered at first by angry distrust in Martin's. Presently, however, his expression changed. His face softened and, leaning towards her, he put a hand gently over both hers.

"That's all right, kiddie," he said. "I've taken your word about all that. A little soap of relief came from Nancy, but there was still trouble in Martin's eyes as he turned to the detective again. "Did this man tell you anything else, Inspector? Did he - did he explain how he got hurt?"

"He says that happened when he returned to the flat after being here. He found the door off, the latch and just as he went in a man rushed out of Borden's room and came into him, knocking him down with his head against a corner of the hat-stand. He swears that the next thing he knew was when he came to and found himself in hospital."

"Did he recognize the man?"

"No. His tale is that whoever it was switched off the room light as he came out and there was none in the hall. Besides, it was all so quick that he was down and out before he knew what had hit him."
