Regional Restoration Program To Be Costly

Steel arrived in the province yesterday for the construction of the St. Peter's bridge, one of a number of bridges needed to bridge the weekend as torrential rain and melting snow caused an estimated $300,000 damage.

A second load of steel is expected today from Amherst for the Bridgetown bridge repair job.

Highways Minister Philip Matheson said that an accurate estimate of damage would be impossible but it would easily cost the government between $200,000 and $300,000 to restore bridges and roadbeds.

It is estimated that a new bridge to span the bridge destroyed on the Trans-Canada Highway at "Boss' Corner will cost some $50,000.

A highway department engineer and the contractor are drawing plans, and the new bridge will be designed as a permanent structure.

Mr. Matheson said that it is felt that it will "just a few days" before the broken bridge at St. Peter's is restored.

The toughest job is expected to be the Bridgetown bridge, and a contractor will be sent moving into the area to assess the damage.

An alternate route to Souris, which was cut off completely by floods, has been established by re-routing traffic along the Carleton Place to the Upper Road, which has been established to the main highway. It adds 13 miles to the trip.

It is hoped that a shorter detour will be made available when the Sparrow Road, circling the town of Souris, is restored.

The main Charlottetown to Montague highway is open with traffic flowing over the Hurst bridge, which was partially destroyed Monday.
