OTTAWA, (Special) — There are a few red faces both in Ottawa and Charlottetown following the discovery that there is neither a survey plan nor title deed to be found for the old Charlottetown Post Office building on Queen Square. The property, which formerly housed the Post Office, the Customs and Excise offices and the local income tax staff is supposed to be owned by the Federal Government, but so far there are no documents to prove it.

UNDERSTANDING REACHED

An understanding has been reached between the Federal and P.E.I. Governments that in any such sale, the Provincial Government will have top priority over any other bidders. The Provincial Government position is that it urgently needs the space to house Provincial Government offices.

RAY OF HOPE

A ray of hope is seen by the legal authorities here in the fact that they have a letter from a former P.E.I. Provincial Secretary setting forth or at least admitting that the old Post Office is the property of the Dominion Government, and owned by the Crown in the right of Canada. Whether this would constitute satisfactory evidence in a court of law is not quite certain.
