ELLEN'S DIARY

Frivolity Is Over--Now Down To Earth Living

At Alderlea the farmers have arrived at the season of least churning about piggeries and stables. It is true that this state does not last. Once the autumn litters commence to appear, the chores will increase and if they follow the usual cycle will continue to through the stabling and on into the late springtime when the peak reached, will decline again to the quiet pleasant mid-summer-calm.

Now the flock of sheep and lambs, pretty well taking care of itself, pastures in a bonny sight on the pretty fields of the other farm. The younglings of our cattle graze on a distant pasture of this one. We catch sight of them sometimes, from the yard, limited prettily on a hilltop against the bright of the sunset clouds. The cows with their nursing calves are our near company and Alex's absorbing entertainment as they crop "the grass and clover sweet" of the front meadow.

From the piggeries at the moment every piglet and weanling has vanished, every fat hog. Only the company of expectant sows come by from the orchard to enjoy their afternoon siestas in the airy coolness it affords the same matrons James spoke of his morning when outward bound to the Fair.

"If it should happen that we are late returning, Ellen" he said with a parting smile and wave "you might throw them a bite... And if the troughs are empty in the afternoon, would you run fresh water into them?" he called back as the machine nosed down the driveway and was soon lost to sight around a leafy bend of lane.

As good for the would have it, he himself was present at the evening feeding, as was the young farmer and for us, all was well again with the farm.

Now, we remember, the festive week of the Fair will be over, already its interests and delights fading into the past. Once more the affairs of our farming will fall into their usual practical perspective. Not that they have suffered during the interval. At the same time, we have a notion, that by this all that which James terms, "frivolity" will have terminated and our down-to-earth living been resumed.

At breakfast this very morning the design of its fabric will be outlined in more than one topic. Even we shall continue to it. Putting first things first we shall mention "that firewood" that should be stored "with the summer-sun in it" and he will speak of a dozen items crowding for attention in this between-time which precedes our pleasant harvest-lays.

And the August sun mellowed and the grainlands reach up for its gold. Twilight comes in earlier from the hillslope, and another change of season is near.

Autumn waits, the young swallows told us today, beneath the summer-blue haze, just behind a pasture-hill.

Until tomorrow--Diary Good night....

Home Dressmakers Have Fall Fashion Pointers

As everyone knows, the past year has been a controversial one for Fashions. Never before have women been so timid about new styles, so doubtful about the tried and true fashions. Happily for Fall 1958, adaptations of the new relaxed lines are proving so wearable and irresistible that women -- and yes, men, too -- are satisfied with the newer look. Now, at last, you can make up for lost time -- sure that the dress you sew will not be so radical as to be out of date in a short time or will be criticized as unflattering.

Here are a few important guide posts: Hems will be shorter, but skirts will not be tapered to their former unmovable tightness as introduced last season. The degree of shortness is up to you only an inch higher from the floor, or more, if you find it flattering.

Generally speaking, lines are fluid and a little more flowing. This means they are often fitted over the bust and waist belted, as often as not. The shirtwaist dress is enjoying -- and all those who wear it, too -- a fine distinction even among the higher stylized silhouettes. New collars stand away from the neck, new yokes give interest to the bodice.

No Fall Fashion report would be complete without mention of jumpers. This season, pockets either the patch or slit type -- are used to emphasize the fluid lines. Wear your jumper belted or unbelted as you prefer. A new note is to pick up a color of the jumper for the blouse. If a green and blue plaid is used, make the blouse in green or blue. If a solid color is selected, complement it with a contrasting color or a print.

Now for the new Fall fabrics. In the high style bracket -- and with the higher price tags -- are mohair and alpaca. Next are the woolen knits. Some are novelties which look almost like hand knitted. Others, like the jerseys, are printed in floral or geometric designs. Yet printed woollens and woolen mixtures are big news right now. This does not mean that they overshadow those wonderful fall cottons that have the look of woollens and the practical feature of cotton.

Colors in these fabrics are a delight. Blues are in the lead -- bright to navy. Reds range from soarlet to Calypso Pink. The new browns has warm russet-red tones. The greens are both bright and dark. There are so many shades you will have no trouble in making a selection.

From all this news, there are really only three things to remember in planning your dressmaking in order to have it successful. First, make sure that the style you select is becoming. Second, think of what you look best in -- what color dress brought you the most compliments.

Choose a new fall shade in the color you wear the best. Then with the style and color selected, turn your attention to the third and very important consideration of what type of fabric is right for your dress. Avoid the heavy fabrics unless the style is a tailored one. When buying one of the new blends, ask about wash ability.

You may find that for a few cents more a yard you can get a fabric that is machine washable or will keep pleats without pressing. This will save you many dollars in dry cleaning bills, many hours over the ironing board. This is particularly important in the selection of fabrics for children's clothes. "Wash and wear," "easy care" and "drip and dry" are wonderful words to all of us and now identify some of the loveliest fall fabrics in this amazing, progressive, scientific world of ours.

Teaches Sunday School For Fifty-Seven Years

A sprightly North Bay, Ontario, lady who remembers when horse-drawn rigs were the chief mode of transportation is teaching Sunday School for her 57th consecutive year.

Mrs. James Daly, 92, is known to the youngsters at Feronia United Church as "Aunt Mary." She has taught Sunday School in the little church 12 miles northeast of North Bay since 1901, and her class now includes grandchildren of her first pupils. Born in England, she came to Canada with her family in 1871, and they lived at Hamilton before coming to Feronia at the turn of the century.

Two years ago the children of the Sunday school gave her a beautifully-bound Bible for her 90th birthday.

Mrs. Daly scoffs at suggestions that she takes things easy. She often walks the four miles from her home to the church, and she splits her own winter supply of wood.

HOUSEHOLD HINT

Dieters trying to lose weight usually follow a vicious circle of reducing with enthusiasm, tapering off, regaining the weight and dieting again.

It is now generally believed that a tendency to overweight is a lifetime affliction curable only by establishing a different set of permanent eating habits.

If you're an insomniac, all the remedies are worth trying -- including earplugs and eye masks, no matter how foolish they sound to some.
