Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Canada has a brand new frontier which will soon be bringing new life to the steel industry.

The great iron deposits lie in the Burnt Creek Section of Labrador between the Atlantic Ocean and Hudson's Bay, where thousands of workmen are going to move mountains of iron to gigantic blast furnaces in the steel making centres of North America.

Already stockholders have invested $200,000,000 in the project. No government funds have been used to date.

The new Iron Ore Company of Canada came into being in 1949. The picture looked so rosy that American Steel Companies jumped into the field. Fresh supplies of steel were urgently needed to supplant the dwindling supply in the mountains of Minnesota.

If things work out according to plans the first ore train should be moving out of the barren wilderness by 1954.

Already an airlift, the railroad, power plants, prospecting schedules, and geological survey have been drawn into a closely knit plan to send the riches of Labrador flowing towards blast furnaces in two years.

However, before this can be accomplished a 358 mile railway will have to be built from Burnt Creek to the gigantic ore terminal being established at Seven Islands. It is expected that it will take less than 24 hours to move 100-car trains of ore between the two points.

From Seven Islands the ore would be routed more than 1000 sea miles to Baltimore for inland shipment to United States steel centers.

Commercial planes are doing a land order business transporting men and machinery destined to carve a path of commerce in the new frontier of Canada.

In fair weather and foul 13 planes zoom through the sky, moving men and supplies "up the line". They are let down at railroad construction plants, at outlying camps, and at the main base of operations, Burnt Creek—a village with growing pains—and now boasting over 600 persons in the heart of the howling wilderness where, in Winter, the temperature often drops to 50 below zero.

The railroad from Burnt Creek to Seven Islands will be the major line construction in North America in half a century. It is being built under free enterprise in a dramatic example of the value of profits to both the workers and the public at large.

The new line will travel across two major bridges, and at least one tunnel, and a big power dam. Spurs will make contact between the terminal and the mine pits in the area. It is calculated that six daily trains will be needed to keep the ore moving over this 358 miles strip of railway.

Ore docks capable of handling 10,000 tons of iron ore each year will be set up at the Seven Islands terminal.

The little wilderness village never sleeps. Chemists and geologists work around the clock; bearded prospectors and drill camp operators are prawning about at all hours of the day and night.

Indeed, Burnt Creek represents civilization to the men who have been working the bush country these past six years, and in the not too distant future it promises to become an important industrial town.

Before the coming of the white traders to Coronation Gulf the Eskimos used only bows and arrows to hunt game. The traders brought them rifles, ammunition in unlimited quantities, cooking utensils, knives, coaloil and even silk underwear. At first the Eskimo's wants had been few.

The phase in the introduction of civilization was to teach them to want things they had never seen or heard of before and, of course, to charge them exorbitant prices for everything they bought.

As late as 1923 a 30-30 Winchester rifle sold for 23 white foxes, which was later reduced to ten; three boxes of cartridges represented the value of a fox, and these were sometimes used for counters when purchasing smaller things.

The indiscriminate sale of rifles and gun fodder led to such a slaughter of the caribou that their ranks were too seriously thinned; as a consequence the once self-supporting natives became almost wholly dependent on the traders for their bread and butter.

Too, the effect on Eskimos of giving up their customary food and skin clothing for imported woolen and cotton goods—quite unsuited for Arctic wear—and imported salted and canned goods, etc., eventually lowered their native vigor, and resistance to disease, and other unaccustomed ailments resulting from the change in their mode of living.

To replace the almost depleted caribou in the Delta a herd of 3,000 reindeer were brought in from Alaska at late as 1929. The animals were conveyed from Buckland Point in Alaska to the Kittigazuit Peninsula, east of the mouth of the MacKenzie River, an area said to contain 15 thousand square miles and to be capable of supporting a quarter of a million reindeer. The long trek covered almost 2,000 miles over mountain range and barren tundra. One thousand animals perished on this history making march, but an addition of 300 calves born the first spring after their parents' arrival, helped to make up the loss.

The meat of the domesticated reindeer is almost as good as beef, and the government expects to ultimately establish large herds in the Arctic and to teach the Eskimos how to care for the animals.
