ELLEN'S DIARY

Misery, Often Sadness Follow Traffic Mishaps

"Well, so long... and safe home!" we at this house find ourselves saying these times to the departing guest. And reared in days when mishaps on the Island's roads were not so frequent as now, we follow the car in mind more or less anxiously along the busy traffic lanes it must join. "There can be no idle angels in Heaven tonight!" one of a little company that had lingered chatting on the dais at a verandah, remarked fancifully the other evening, as the traffic of a busy highway flower past a lane's end.

The afternoon had faded then to a rosy hue in the west. Shadows were dimming the river there and telling the farmsteads at its father side. Now lights were commencing to shine in the windows, and on the machines, marking the course of this or that village we could see from there. Stars too were pricking out in the cloudless sky, complementing that of the evening, which shone with a steady light shows a fair rise of hill. We counted them as they went, then! And as the shading continued, there were too many to number, but with a sound like the rising and fall of waves breaking on a shore, the traffic, lights accenting each hurrying vehicle, went by.

Woodleigh Republic and the MacLeod clan gatherings were Mr. and Mrs. John Campbell who plan to leave this week for their home in California.
