In the Wildwood—Gentlemen Farm-

OTAMATEA, KAIPARA,
Auckland, New Zealand.
December 23, 1879.

MY DEAR,—A few days ago R offered to give me a glimpse of the wilds. We left Tahoa at 11 a. m., and plunged into the bush, groped our way through tangled roots of trees with a dense dark foliage overhead in which sat the tui bird warbling in flute-like notes "seek her out, seek her out," as if his very soul were melting to find her, whoever she may be. After a long scramble we came to a winding cow path.
This was the main road and glad we were to find it. For some distance we wound our way round fern-covered eminences and then sank again into the hollows, where, with dense fern trees growing above our heads we saw not a glimpse of anything but this thick scrubby bush stretching across the narrow footpath, obscuring the view of the road itself.
But I must not weary you with an account of the hills we passed over, the bogs we stuck in, the fern wastes we wandered through, the pheasants that started at our feet, the wild hogs that scattered at our approach. In a little dell, we sat down under a beautiful fern, with a clear rippling stream at our feet, with wearied limbs and sharpened appetites, ate our sandwiches and cake, slaked our thirst at the flax margined rivulet, bathed our heads and feet and resumed our tramp. At about 4 p. m., we reached the crowning height of the district.
I cannot attempt a description of the scene before us, but will give a catalogue of what we saw. Round hills covered with small ferns of various kinds, bright greenish yellow grass-growing slopes, at long intervals cultivated patches, wide plains of giant flax, irregular, broken, tumbled hillocks grown over with the lavender colored straggling bushy stunted fern tree, six feet in height, steep cones rising to view, crowned with every variety of native wood. Far back against a background of deep cerulean sky, stands the forest, golden, green, bronze, grey, white, with all the intervening shades intermingled, topped here and there by a blaze of crimson bloom. Among the crests of steed hills glisten bright river glimpses, and a branch of the Kaipara, half hidden by intervening hillocks, lies tranquilly in the distance, like a succession of lakes.
On our way home we met Norman on his way from school. With him was a foreigner, whom we learned was the curator of Christ Church Museum. While we were talking to him, Norman made a sudden dab at the horse's back, and caught an atrocious looking insect, which the Austrian Professor, with a smile of triumph, put into a bottle of spirits prepared for such victims. Crossing a farm we met a man with a pair of coarse trousers slouched into his boots somehow, a wide-brimmed hat on the back of his head, a coarse shirt, half open and flapping on his bare brown neck, a leather belt about his waist, shirt sleeves hanging open to the elbow and in his hand a milk pail, which he was swinging to and fro. That is Mr. —, said R. a good, steady fellow he is, and comes from a good English family. We neared and were introduced. He soon proved himself a gentleman in spite of his disguise. Sons of officers, clergymen, Oxford students, &c., are often met with here in the bush, with their coats of doing their own work, whatever it may be. In their houses you will see their "Coats of Arms," and well-worn books of standard literature, and if there is any doubt on your mind on the subject, their gentlemen bearing soon dispels it.
This gives farming a very different position in the social scale from what it holds in Canada. But then we must remember that here few farmers have less than three or four hundred acres—a thousand acres in one farm is quite a common thing. Here in the North more attention is given to cattle raising than agriculture, and small farmers are contemptuously styled 40-acre men, having reference to those who coming to the country with little money received allotments of land to that extent free, on condition of clearing it and settling thereon. But I must return to our journey.
We borrowed a boat and crossed a river to Pa'u, where we remained until next morning. At 10 a. m. we arose and returned to Tahoa, reaching there at 10.30 a. m.
January 2nd.—On Christmas eve we went to the woods and got a small puriri tree. After putting it up firmly we got out our presents and decorated the green and waving boughs. The Canadian presents were quite unexpected, and were received with great applause! Christmas day we were ill invited to the Maori festival, but which threatened not only to keep away the "Pakehas," but the Maori's themselves. Gradually, however, the sky became clearer, and our party ventured forth.
Rain and sunshine struggling, bathed the wooded hills and bright green slopes with tremulous golden mist. The foliage dripping with moisture, glistened with pri-matic drops. The crickets renewed their cheerful chirp, the tui birds and the matin bells called on all to rejoice on this great festival day. On a grassy flat, elevated only a few feet above the beach, stands the Maori church. Passing under the spreading branches of a fine old tree, which is said to have been the central point of cannibal feasts in the "good old times," we entered the sacred edifice, which stands hardly like a penitential offering or material evidence of a sincere repentance. The building is about 50x30, it has a tapering steeple, around which are smaller spires.
The building is constructed with a view of ventilation: coolness and cleanliness. The main roof is high, and supported by polished pillars of Kauri wood, of which the seats etc. are also made. It is a yellowish wood marked with reddish brown. The seats are long wooden benches, with sloping backs, and are in three rows. At the upper end is a raised platform with railing in front, near it is the reading desk, and below it the organ. When we entered this quite secluded place of worship, we noted that the Maori's had decorated every window and pillar with branches of feathery fern, and garlands of flowers. They had formed an arch of ferns over the reading desk, interspersed with passion flowers, and white and scarlet trumpet flowers, nine or ten inches in length, laden with perfume dropped down the sides. Altogether, the church presented a bright, graceful appearance, draped with the spoils of forest and garden, symbolizing simplicity, freshness and purity. The few pakehas (white people) were shown to the upper seats facing the aisles. The Maori's occupied the centre.

They were of all ages, and varying as much in expression, figure, feature and dress as any white congregation. A tall, violently-dressed young woman stalked in with an air of assumed indifference to the general observation she attracted. Then came an old man with bent figure, and deeply tattooed, approaching as nearly as possible in features to the "missing link"; after him a plain, bustling woman of the world, with a deal of matter-of-fact common sense showing in her black, square-fitting attire and broad self-satisfied features. Next appeared a graceful girl of seventeen, with long, dark eyelashes, regular features, a natural, easy, upright bearing, which seemed to harmonize admirably with the wildwood sweetness and natural grace of the forest fern, under the shade of which, in a quiet rock, she took her seat, and opened her book of printed prayers, so occupying the time until service began.
Next came a tall young fellow, a model of physical perfection, and with an expression of active sympathy and kindness, glancing around until his eyes pierced a screen of fern which half hid the young woman who was so intent upon her book. A look of satisfaction passed over his face as he went up and took his seat on the platform with the missionary. Now came a man of darker hue, with black, crisp hair, and long, lank jaws, and piercing, unsettled eyes, "in a fine frenzy rolling." When he opened his mouth to sing he bared his teeth very recent convert to Christianity. More Maori's followed, until the seats were very well filled, and a stout tattooed old veteran, the chief of the Kaipara tribe, entered and took his seat with the missionary and his assistant on the platform.
Mr. G.—, the Wesleyan missionary who officiates in the village church, now opened the service with a hymn in the Maori language, the majority of the natives singing in clear, earnest tones.
In turn Adam Clarke (the chief) and the ministers led the service. A part consisted in reading from a Prayer Book a portion of the Church of England prayers, the Maori's responding in a musical monotone.
I could not help thinking how suitable that beautiful liturgy is to every class and people, and could not help admiring the liberal spirit of the Wesleyan missionary of Kakairia. After the service, the chief and a few other Maori notables, came forward and shook hands very cordially in Pakeha fashion. I forgot to mention some hymn singing by the Maori young folk in the church. They performed their part very creditably, and some of them had particularly soft, musical voices. A noticeable feature of the Maori manner in church is the utter absence of staring and gaping. They go to worship and preserve a fixed attention to the service throughout.
We gathered in the church porch, and again came Xmas greetings Pakeha and Maori, Tina Koe resounded on all sides, (I salute you, I wish you well), and general good feeling prevailed. From the church we went to a house near by, built in European style. The banquet hall had been swept and garnished for the occasion with ferns and flowers tastefully interwoven.
Long tables occupied the centre of the room, and the orthodox roast beef and plum pudding awaited our attack. The cooking was done outside in the rear of the building. Many Maori's from adjacent districts, in spite of the unpropitious weather, had come to accept their friends' hospitable invitation.
Their greetings were natural and affectionate, without any appearance of striving to attract attention. What a change within the memory of many living Maori's! Not fifty years ago some of those now sitting on the same benches with us had been cannibals!
One tattooed old warrior, smiling pleasantly at me across the table, had, when a boy, dined on what is now poitely termed "long perk," within a hundred yards of this very spot. The orderly manner in which the natives behaved at this large gathering, where all varieties of disposition had assembled, was worthy of note. The Pakeha and Maori guests, together with the chief and notabilities of the village, sat down at the first table to a comfortable and well-prepared meal, while three native bellies waited on the guests, and used every endeavor to make everything go off pleasantly. Then came a second table, after which the company dispersed in groups along the shore and through the fields. The teacher tried to get up some games, foot races, leaping, etc., but the sultry, unsettled weather prevented the sports being entered into with spirit. The rain clouds gathered again, so our kind entertainers gave us tea, and then with many friendly farewells bade us adieu and we beat a hasty retreat to our homes, after spending a novel and thoroughly enjoyable day, and so ended Xmas at Kakairia.
This is the "poor man's paradise." You can buy good land here for £2 stg. an acre with small trees on it, which you can cut down at the rate of an acre a week if you are an expert woods-man. Then in dry weather set fire to it all as it lies and it will burn well, leaving a good solum of ashes and only a few stumps. Wait for suitable weather and stride over the ashes, a thin scattering of grass seeds, and in ten months time from when it was covered with wood, fine cattle may be seen grazing knee deep in pasture. The stumps here are not cut in about two years, so if you want to cultivate, go ahead, and you have a soil that will grow splendid crops for years without manure.

All the cattle here that I have seen are of fine breed, and the horses are very large.

Sons of Temperance.
The thirty-sixth annual session of the Grand Division, S. of T., was held to Hamilton on the 30th ult.
The session was one of the most numerously attended ever held in the Province, there being about 130 delegates and visiting members present.
The morning session was occupied chiefly in reading reports of G. W. Patriarch, Grand Scribe and Grand Trust asurer, the appointment of committees, and the initiation of new members, of whom there were fifteen.
The afternoon sessions were taken up in hearing reports of committees, the disposal of the same, and the election and installation of officers.
The following were elected officers for the present year:—
G. W. Patriarch—Wm. McN. Simpson, Hamilton,
G. W. Associate—Rev. Geo. Steel, Vernon River.
Grand Scribe—J. S. Burns, Lower Freetown.
Grand Treasurer—William Brown, Margate.
Grand Chaplain—Rev. W. P. Archibald,
New Glasgow.
Grand Conductor—Maggie Smith, New Glasgow.
Grand Sentinel—Richard Nelson, Crapaud.
The following places were appointed for holding the sessions of Grand Division during the year:
January session at Graham's Road.
April session at Summerside.
July session at Eldon, Belfast.
October session at Charlottetown.
Among many other resolutions passed at the session was the following, which was passed unanimously: Resolved, That the thanks of this Grand Division are due, and the same are hereby tendered, to James Coleman, Esq., Superintendent of P. E. I. Railway, for his kindness in granting reduced fares to delegates attending this session of Grand Division.
A public temperance meeting was held in the evening, Hon. John A. Macdonald, Speaker of the House of Assembly, in the chair. Stirring speeches were made by D.
Rogers, H. H. Pollard, Rev. W. P.
Archibald, R. M. Barratt, J. V. Chappell, Rev. George Steel and James Cairuthair.
The speeches were interspersed with recitations and singing, and added very much to the evening's entertainment.
After a vote of thanks to the Chairman, a very pleasant, and we trust profitable, meeting was brought to a close.
