ELLER'S DIARY

Perennials Are Safe Under Cover Of Spruce

Clean and cool this December day came to us. "It's a pretty morning" we said, stopping by a window to watch the flash of snow, deep on the cheek of the day. "It is, Ellen," James, came in then full of cheer. "And I was just thinking when I was at the choring, it's a day like this, here, frozen, that always reminds me. Well, I fancy I can hear them passing: the wagons and carts of the long ago. There'd be teams to the mill by this. Yes," he nodded, "by daybreak, for the mill was a busy place at this time of year."

"It was" we said, recalling days gone. "They brought grist to it for miles, I remember. Indeed I often think of it—seeing a farmer from across the River, leaving for home one dark night of the Fall with two rigs—and fine horses they were, and carts. He was driving one and leading the other. He had four—a d bran and 'crushing'—enough to do till the spring!"

"And what a long, tiresome trip that would be!" "And it's likely he wouldn't go by the ferry, but take the longest way round, after night. I'm sure, I don't suppose he would consider that in those days. He would be happy to be getting in his supplies for the winter."

"And nowadays," we began, "Novadays" James arched, "they're so pampered they have to ride, even as far as Jane's end to fetch the mail!" "Fingers lifted that spread to day's wash. "It was fairly cool here when we arrived. Yes, we finally reached our winter home!" Papa started related in his recent communication—and it was fragrant with the scent of orange blossoms, and "the point-tias—you should see them!" he would write. "But 'tis' he continued, "the weather has been warm and sunny. We're enjoying it now. I clean forgot to bring my old pipe with me! If you chance to see it around, mail it to me, would you? Just address it to me at 'General Delivery' and it will be sure to reach me."
