Electronic Brain To Control Missile Base Operations

By DAVE MCINTOSH
Canadian Press Staff Writer
OTTAWA (CP)—The electronic brain which will control the operations of Canada's two Bomarc anti-aircraft missile stations will be installed at North Bay, Ont. Work on the site has started.
Presence of the brain—known as SAGE (Semi-Automatic Ground Environment)—at North Bay together with one Bomarc unit scheduled to be installed there and the two CF-100 jet fighter squadrons already there would make the city a prime target in event of Russian war attack on North America. The other Bomarc station will be in the vicinity of Mont Laurier, Que.
SAGE assimilates the information from aircraft-tracking radars works out the point of interception and automatically fires the Bomarc interceptor missile. The Bomarc cannot function without SAGE.
Although SAGE can control Bomarc stations located hundreds of miles away, it is understood the control unit for Canada is being established at North Bay because the RCAF barracks there will be available for use by SAGE and Bomarc personnel.
CANADA PAYS A THIRD
The program for one SAGE unit, two Bomarc stations and additional radars will cost some $375,000,000, of which Canada will pay $125,000,000 and the United States the remaining two-thirds.
The U.S. is also paying full development costs for SAGE and Bomarc.
In the Commons Friday, Paul Hellyer (L—Toronto Trinity) asked about a Toronto Globe and Mail dispatch from Washington which said the American Bomarc-B missile will not be available until 1963.
Defence Minister Peakes reiterated that the Bomarc-B will be available at the end of 1961. He did not say when it would be installed in Canada.
Doubt about the future of the Bomarc program was raised this week when the U.S. House of Representatives voted to cut it by $162,700,000.

Atlantic Congress Sessions Ended

By DAVE OANCIA
Canadian Press Staff Writer
LONDON (CP)—Delegates to the Atlantic Congress ended their six-day conference Wednesday and immediately embarked on preliminary arrangements to implement some of their proposals.
In a general declaration, the 650 delegates from 14 of the 15 NATO countries prescribed more co-operation among Western Allies and a massive aid program for underdeveloped countries as some of the guidelines for the Atlantic alliance during the next decade.
But they warned that the West must continue to rely on military might to hold the line against communism, and urged that NATO forces forming the European shield be brought up to strength as soon as possible.
Some of the delegates started work on a proposal to create a studies centre for the Atlantic community to serve as a clearing house and intellectual focus for the alliance—a move strongly backed by Canadian delegates.
WILGROSS COMMITTEE
The proposal was drafted by a committee headed by Dana Wilgross, retired Canadian diplomat who held posts in Moscow, London and NATO headquarters.
Present plans call for meeting before the delegates disperse to set up a preparatory committee to plan and consider financing the centre. Expectations are its budget will have to be about $300,000 annually for five years.
The majority of the Wilgross committee supported the idea that the centre be located somewhere in Europe with a liaison bureau in either Canada or the United States.
The action on the centre was cited as an example of what can be done to implement the proposals.
"But there will still be a need for continuing meetings on other topics," said Walter Dinsdale, Conservative member of the Canadian Parliament for Brandon-Souris and chairman of the congress' main political committee.
"The feeling of unity coming out of the various meetings would soon wither away if there were no further meetings."
Harry F. Jones of Saskatoon, Canadian delegation head, viewed the congress declaration as a "sober and realistic account" to the free world of what must be done during the next decade to preserve freedom.
An appeal against "excessive nationalism" brought loud applause during the closing minutes of the congress.
CLOSE-THE-RANKS
Lewis Douglas, former U.S. ambassador to Britain, issued his close-the-ranks appeal linked by the delegates with intensive French lobbying and the absence of Iceland from the congress.
The French delegates pressed the argument that NATO countries should not sacrifice their sovereignty by storing nuclear weapons for which they did not receive the secrets.
Iceland refused to attend the congress because of its fishing limits dispute with Britain.
