France Develops Secret Service To Smash Spying

BY GLADYS M. ARNOLD
Canadian Press Correspondent.

A new poster covers the billboards of France. On a dark background, rows of white crosses become smaller and smaller until they gradually disappear but the first line of crosses is made by the shadows thrown from the giant letters of the word "Repression," at the top a hand holds a telephone from which expanding rays make a second great word, "Indiscretion."

This is the first official and public move against espionage in France. It reminds French citizens that it is necessary to be prudent in times of war—for in Europe every country is at last beginning to acknowledge that we are really engaged in a kind of war. The "whisper" they call it because its deadly power is hidden behind economic fronts.

Probably no city in the world is quite so dramatic as Paris. The stories one might read in Canada and be considered first class fiction—adventure or detective variety, stories with first class plots for an Oppenheim, or Wallace, or O. Henry, are to be found in common-place items every day in Parisian newspapers.

On an innocent-looking street through which one passes every day remains the fruit peddlers park their wagons piled high with peaches and the children play with the remains of the sand left in a pile last September, suddenly one reads that a little hotel was raided and two international spies rounded up.

France's "Deuxieme Bureau," the equivalent of the British Secret Service, has been at work again.

Or as happened to one visitor from United States a year or so ago. In the basement of the apartment house in which he lives a gang of arms smugglers had built a munition deposit without the knowledge of either proprietor or concierge.

Watch Foreigners

Only when a long black car drew up and plain-clothesmen followed by policemen stepped out to demand entrance did the astonished proprietor become aware of the use to which his basement had been put. These are not fiction stories, but events which have and are taking place regularly. Paris, because of its central position, is a convenient centre for all sorts of crime and subversive rings. The liberty and refuge which it offers to the refugees and spies of the world is not always respected.

At the present moment, however, the big worry is espionage. With between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 foreigners in France it is a staggering task to keep them sorted out and find the undesirable if there be any.

Thus the "Deuxieme Bureau" of the Ministry of War has brought to perfection a secret service corps whose exploits are more exciting than fiction. Under the leadership of the General Director of National Security, M. Amedee Bussieres, three men meet every Monday in the Rue des Saussaies (Deuxieme Bureau) to review the results of their investigations. They are Messrs. Castaing, Mondanel and Blanc. Each has his own branch to deal with, but sometimes it is almost impossible to distinguish the special worry of M. Blanc (Foreign Propaganda), from "Spying," the problem of M. Castaing, or "Terrorism," handled by M. Mondanel.

The Deuxieme Bureau is an ordinary looking building which has no distinguishing feature likely to attract the attention of a passing tourist or lead him to suspect that on the second floor some of the most dangerously fascinating stories in the world may be unfolding. Only the great outer door which has "W.C." written in five languages—Wychod, Uska, Ausgang and Sortie—suggests that its clientele is international. The foreign suspect enters here freely.

In the interior there are several parts visible to the public. One section deals with research, another study section, another filing and documentation. In interior rooms steel files reach to the ceiling. Each has a name and a number and in each is a record. There are more than seven million dossiers there. In one of them may be found the indiscretions of the new suspect.

Scientific Helps

But there is also the invisible part of the bureau. Every form of technical advancement, in electricity, radio, telephone (telegraph and sound detector) at the disposal of the officials. But each man must be as invisible and secret as the gods. Secret the place where they meet; secret where they work; how they spend their time.

There's a story told in Paris about the secret agent.

A small boy arrived at the wicket in front of the movie theatre and demanded a ticket. "But you can't go in unaccompanied little man," said the doorman.

"But can't I," said the boy, "my father is with me."

"Where is he?" asked the doorman, looking about puzzled.

"Oh, you can't see him," replied the boy as he slipped past. "He's an invisible secret agent."

The system as far as it was known is that the secret service man reports to the Deuxieme Bureau which in turn informs the military department of justice. Working in co-operation with the prefecture of police, it is not long before the suspect is arrested by a regular policeman and taken to "Cherche-Midi," the great prison which rears its severe walls in the middle of Paris at the corner of the Boulevard Raspail.

In France the sentence for spying was a maximum of five years in peace time—up until 1924, it was then increased from 10 to 20 years and since June 17, 1938, the punishment is death.

Four men have been shot as spies or traitors within the last year and at present investigations have made it necessary to warn the general public that the ear of the enemy is everywhere.

Flaunting their armed strength in the face of the League's ban on militarizing Danzig Free State, these Danzig Nazis in full uniform lined up before their mobile field artillery Albert Forster, their "Little Hitler," assured them that Adolf Hitler would soon be there—"come what may."

Candy-making hint: Add one tablespoon of grapefruit juice for each two cups of sugar used to prevent candies from graining. This will also make them more delicious and creamy.

There should be 2,360,000 grains of sugar in a pound when you buy it, judging by a report that one grain of sugar weighs 68 ten-millionths of an ounce.

GREEN AIDS STRAIN IN OPERATING ROOM

LONDON, Aug. 23—(CP)—Men and women in green are reducing eye-strain at St. Thomas' Hospital here. Not only are the surgeons, anaesthetists, and nurses working in the operation room gowned in green coats, overalls and caps, but sheets and towels are also green.

After experiment with different colors to eliminate eye-strain caused by the glare of high-powered lights on white linen, surgeons discovered a dark shade of sage green cotton crash would solve their difficulty.

White uniforms still swish through the corridors and wards of the hospital, however. They are considered fresher and more professional looking.
