CHAPTER FIVE

Part Two

Rusty grinned dryly. "So they even have got the fish sewed up, have they?" he commented. Celia's color rose but before she could say anything Rusty said quickly, "Skip it! That was very ill-mannered of me, to throw rocks at your friends! I didn't really mean it."

"I suppose you despise them too," said Celia hotly. Rusty's eyebrows went up a little. "Why should I? It's their life and they live it their own way! I try to live my own and let the other fellow manage his! I've never felt that my own—er—morals were high enough to permit me to throw rocks at other people! Live and let live—that's my motto. Remember?"

Celia studied him curiously for a moment. "You were a soldier, overseas where it must have been pretty awful!" she said quietly. "Yet you can come home and see people who spend their money ignoring the war, and you don't want to set fire to their places?"

Rusty smiled at her, but there was no humor in his smile. "You know, Celia," Rusty said seriously, "it takes all kinds of people to make a world go around. Pardon me if I originate a brand new thought, eh? I realize that Malory is no good for the army; he's too old and he's not physically fit. I admit that there are ways in which he might have—well, helped. But on the other hand, there are people who wave the flag who proclaim their patriotism from the house-tops, who get themselves photographed buying fifty thousand dollars' worth of bonds for the privilege of kissing a movie star."

Celia had listened to him with such intense interest that, meeting her eyes, he flushed and said, "This series of lectures will continue under the auspices of the 'Mind Your Own Business' League."

"No, no, please don't laugh," Celia interrupted. "Thank you for saying that! It's well, it's what I wanted to hear! I like the Mallores a lot, and when I'm with them what they say makes sense and I believe they are right."

"Don't go relying too much on my judgment, lady," protested Rusty. "I'm a lone wolf. I play my own cards the way I see 'em. I've never had any responsibility and I don't want any! You make up your own mind your own way and don't go making me feel that you might be influenced by anything I could do or say!"

Celia was a little puzzled at his vehemence. "You're an odd sort of person," she ventured after a moment. "You'd be surprised how odd," he assured her earnestly. "I'm unique, and you mustn't pay the slightest attention to me. Ever!"

"Well, of course not if that's the way you feel about it," said Celia, smiling at his abruptness. "That's exactly the way I feel about it," Rusty assured her. "I've seen enough damage from people who go around thrusting their opinion on others, absorbing other people's lives taking advantage of another person's love and faith and confidence to rob them of any thoughts of their own— Now it was his turn to break off, to look confused and bitter and to say harshly, "Well, that's pretty involved and I don't think there's any chance of making sense of it, so— shall we hit for home?"

"Let's," said Celia, and they walked side by side along the road in silence. Rusty looked straight ahead, his eyes grim and bleak, as though his thoughts were not pleasant company, but as though he could
