ELLEN'S DIARY

Winter Is Again Outlined Against The Autumn Hills

"That's something every farm could do with" Mack commented, resting his bicycle a moment in the yard on his way to school this morning, to hear the tap of a hammer. "Yes" he nodded, "I'd care to build a new; and to repair. For there's always something to be done. If it's not a door needing a new hinge, there's a manger or a trough to be made. Why, there's just no end to what one could do about a place!"

And there were continued raps and taps. Our carpenter of the summer had returned to another project of carpentry here. This is one which had been in James' mind for years. We had now and then discussed it, and then because of seemingly more necessary work to be done, we had put it by until some later day. Now catching the outline of winter against the autumn hills, vague yet to be sure, but nonetheless in a definite silhouette there, brought purpose to the thought.

"We must get that back verandah closed, Ellen" he said the other morning at breakfast, "before the winter sets in."

This then is the correct piece of carpentry in progress: the back verandah is being turned into a sunporch-deck.

And how shall we like it—this difference made in the old house, any change has come slowly?

It will have its advantages. The woodbox will be sheltered against any "falling weather," as well as the passage to the cellar and furnace. The winter will be kept further from our door. And any memories of its former days and ways, which once fitted in so nicely with our living will in its own time be lost and forgotten, buried as well be the leaves that now fall serene and spent to the earth.

But meanwhile, we shall be bound to remember old times, and see former scenes—James we shall see in a young year, braving in his work there: may be the driving harness on a Saturday morning, to clean and polish for the Sabbath ahead. Or it could be that he would be fashioning axe-handle from a stick of maple, kept in a season's supply in a corner of the coach-house. Perhaps he edges the axe there, when Spring was commencing to wave her magic wand over the farmlands. Putting "a new song" about and fresh hope in humans' hearts. And the time to come to the woodlands, to harvest the stakes and the rails for the fencing, was nearing.

"I shall try to picture to a young woman there on a sunny day at the washing with United States Air Force last year began a campaign to acquaint its personnel with the relationship between cigarette smoking and lung cancer, pulmonary diseases and cardiovascular diseases."
